THE APPEAL:

THE BEREAVED HUSBAND.

BY MRS. E. L. SAXON.

He sat within a silent room—
Death's shadow was been in view.
His heart was filled with grief and gloom.
His head was bowed in prayer.
He strove to shut out memory,
So filled with bitter pain,
But could behold the weeping eyes
Her glass was fixed again.

Again he stood before his wife
And almost deemed her living—
Again he took the farewell kiss
Which she had died to giving
He half forgot that death had been
Within his peaceful home;
He seemed to feel her presence there,
Beside him in his room.

There stood upon the mantle-shelf
A vase of faded flowers,
They had been planted there by herself
In happier bowing hours;
There sat her vacant crimson chair,
Her shawl across it lying;
It had been folded round her breast
When he had seen her dying.

There was her basket, and her books,
Her work upon the stand,
The Bible where her last sweet looks
On baby words did fall.
A few short hours before and he
Had bowed to her there a bride,
But now she was laid down to rest
With her infant by her side
He did not dream how much he loved
The flower that he had cherished,
Or how she twined about his heart,
Until the bloom had perished.

A NOCTURNAL COMEDY OF ERRORS.

A YOUNG WIFE IN AN EXPERIMENTAL EMBARRASSING SITUATION, AND HER DELIVERANCE THENCE.

From the Cincinnati Enquirer, December 12.]

Some days since, a young couple, who had newly donned hymeneal vestments, came from their home, a pleasant village in this State, to spend a portion of the supposed-to-be delicious period known as the honeymoon, and placed themselves under the charge of the proprietor of the Spencer House. They then sallied forth to witness the beauties and peculiarities of the Queen City, and do, as brides are ever wont, a quantity of the little business embraced in the term "shopping." They were gone several hours, and did not return to the hotel until sundown, quite fatigued with their exertions. The bride, Mrs. R., then found that she had forgotten some articles indispensable to her toilet, and unwilling to disturb her husband, who, she knew must be weary, slipped out while he was down stairs, and went up to Fourth street to get the diminutive bundle. She was successful in her search for the store and the article, but on her way back, mistook, from her ignorance of the city, Main street for Broadway, and the Madison for the Spencer House, which are situated nearly opposite to each other.

Mrs. R. went into the hotel, and thinking it looked rather different from the other, asked one of the waiters she met in the hall, in rather a low and indistinct tone, if that was the "Spencer," to which he falling to understand her, replied in the affirmative. She then ordered him to bring her the key to No. 48, which he did, and she entered it and removed her bonnet, shawl and other portions of her attire, and crept between the sheets of the bed to enjoy a little nap after her long walk, never dreaming she was in the wrong house, for the reason that the apartment happened to have the same position, and furnished very much like the room at the "Spencer."

Instead of taking a "little nap," she fell into a profound sleep, that continued hour after hour until eleven o'clock, at which time she was disturbed by a most unexpected incident.

The rightful occupant of No. 48, a merchant from a town in Indiana, who had been to the theatre and became a little intoxicated, went to the Madison, and wishing no one to see his condition, walked up to the room without a light, and fortunately or unfortunately, found the door unlocked. He entered quietly, and as total darkness reigned there, he removed his garments and crept into the spacious double bed, not disturbing in the least the fair bride who lay near the wall.

How long the man reposed there side by side, with only a foot of space between them, all unconscious of each other's presence, is not exactly known, but probably about an hour, when a tremendous noise was heard in the apartment, from which female screams issued wildly, piercingly and ceaselessly.

The hotel was in an uproar; proprietors, clerks, waiters, porters and guests, dressed and half-dressed, were at the door of "forty-eight" in a few minutes, blocking up the entrance and asking each other eagerly, "What is the matter?" "For God's sake tell us what is the trouble?"

The cause of this outcry may be imagined. The bride had awakened from her sleep, and putting her hand over her husband, it fell upon the Indianian's face, and the soft, warm touch aroused him at once. He did not understand it exactly, though he did not dislike it, and in a moment, he thought, he felt the dearest husband, where have you been all this while?"

"Husband," echoed the merchant, beginning to see, like Lord Tinsel, that he had "made a small mistake here;" "I am nobody's husband, I reckon, my dear madame, you're in the wrong bed."

In the wrong bed—horror of horrors thought the bride. What would her liege lord—what would the curious world say? And Mrs. R. screamed terribly, and sprang from the couch just as her companion did the same. He was fully as much alarmed as she, and entreated her to give him time, and he would leave the apartment, although it was the one he had engaged—he'd make oath to that.

Scream, scream, scream, was the only reply to this lawful proposition.

"My God, madam, don't yell so! you will wake the house. Be reasonable; I swear it's only a mistake. Have some thought of the consequences. I don't want to hurt you; I swan I don't. You'll get me shot, and yourself—well, I won't say what."

The screams increased, and the poor Indianian, expecting every moment to see a pistol thrust in his face by a jealous husband, turned pale as death, which he expected, and resigned himself to his fate.

Just at this juncture, the strong outside presented itself at the door, and beheld Mrs. R. cowering in one corner, exercising her lungs magnificently, with a sheet wrapped over her form and head, and the Indianian in the middle of the room, enveloped in a coverlet, and ejaculating: "My God, madam, don't!"

The junior proprietor, Dr. Cahill, saw there must be some mistake, and requesting the others to retire, called the mechanic, who was with him to another room, and there learned the whole story. The Doctor then sent one of the ladies of the hotel to Mrs. R. and the report of the excited female, greatly relieved though she was overwhelmed with confusion at a circumstance that might have ruined her reputation forever.

Under the escort of the Doctor, she was conveyed to her chamber, where her husband was found pacing the corridors with frantic mein, and half crazed with grief at the mysterious disappearance of his wife, whom he believed had been spirited away by a villian, or murdered for her jewels this "horrid place," where, as he expressed it, "they would kill a man for a dollar any time."

As soon as he beheld his spouse he caught her to his bosom and wept like a child. He was melted with happiness at her discovery and recovery, and told her he had scoured the city for intelligence of her whereabouts in vain. He had nearly given up all hope of meeting her again in this world, though, as he growing positive in his joy, phrased it, she had, from another sphere, made his Paradise in the Eden of her arms.

The bride told the bridegroom a story nearer the truth as she could, which, like most women's histories, designated to shelter themselves, was a model of ingenuity and a miracle of art—without exciting the Othello in his bosom; and with a thousand thanks to the Doctor, whom the Benedick seemed somehow to regard as the deliverer of his consort, they bade him good night,

And sweet dreams with love and Happiness
Let them sink frantic as through boundless tones,
Where bright ideals shine, and all the heart had longed
Was pictured on the opera's enchanting eye.

ELOPEMENT OF A GIRL WITH HER PARAMOUR—PURSUIT OF THE FATHER, AND HIS RETURN WITH THE ERRING DAUGHTER.—Some three weeks since the daughter of Mr. Grosse, a dealer in ladies' shoes, left the city in company with John Mangold, her paramour for St. Louis. The father was of course greatly distressed, as the girl was but sixteen, and he believed she had been induced by a designing villain. About a fortnight elapsed before he learned the direction of the fugitives, and when he did, he set out for the Mound City at once. The statement of the old man was that she had been visiting at his house here about a year, and that the two had eloped clandestinely and formed an illicit connexion. On relating the circumstances at the police office, Detective Richard Barry was detailed to find the parties. During the day it was ascertained that the girl and her paramour were stopping at the Benton House, corner of Myrtle and Third streets, and Officer Barry, by going there to supper, was able to see them, and afterwards conducted them to the police office. The girl at first said they had been married, but subsequently contradicted herself. She stated, also, that she had eloped with him, and not he with her.

A charge of abduction was put against Mangold, and he was locked up at the calaboose. The girls father induced her to remove her baggage from the Benton House and go to the house where he was stopping, from thence to proceed home. The old man appeared very calm, and gave no extraordinary outward exhibition of the deep concern, which no doubt raged in his breast. Mangold showed, by his conduct a lack of manly principle.—Cincinnati Enquirer, 15.

☞ A well-known leader of fashion, from the United States, says a Paris letter in the Philadelphia Gazette, who was sharing in the splendid hospitalities of Compiegne, appeared one evening at a ball in a dress precisely identical with that worn by her Imperial Majesty in person. Great was the astonishment and dismay of the court ladies, for it is known that the Empress Eugenie, whose soul appears to be about equally divided between her dressmaker and her confessor, insists upon the strictest secrecy being observed as to what is destined to adorn her imperial limbs. The audacious "American" vied in fashion and novelty with the Empress. Nay, worse still, when Her Majesty at last stepped up to her rival, and good naturedly asked "which dress was to be considered the original?" the American was unable to reply that that was her "second" appearance in that character!

KANSAS GOLD.—Sewell, Ferris & Co., Wall street, N. Y., have received from Leavenworth City, Kansas, a small portion of gold, which is the first that has been received from thence. It has been assayed at the Government office, and was found to lose in melting 24 per cent., but to be of the high degree of 979 thousandths fineness, of the value of $20 05 per ounce. With the exception of some Georgia gold sent on in a few lots, this Kansas gold is the finest that has been produced in North America.
