Agencies for Foreign Insurance Companies.

EDITORS APPEAL: I have, during the last few days, noticed several cards in the morning papers, certifying to the promptness with which losses at the late fire in our city have been settled by agents here for foreign insurance companies.

There is another branch of this subject that it is equally important to the public to have information upon, and that is, to know in what companies and agencies losses go unadjusted. There is undoubtedly a discrimination to be made between those foreign companies, and, perhaps, between the agents that represent them. What the public needs is proper means to make this discrimination with safety.

For instance, I know a case at the late fire in our city, where an industrious, but intelligent citizen lost everything he had—being property to the amount of some $6,000 to $8,000—which he had accumulated by years of self-denying toil and economy. He had a policy for $5,000 on his property, issued nearly a year ago, by an agency here for a foreign company. He had received no notice or intimation of any failure or embarrassment of the company that issued his policy, neither from the agency it was obtained from, or otherwise; and he was confidently relying on it—perhaps in part induced to do so from the "cards" certifying to "losses promptly adjusted," which had before been published, as the means, in the event of a disaster, to start again in the world.

But the fire came, and on presenting his policy, with a statement of his loss, to the agency where issued, he was told—"Your policy is worthless; the company has been insolvent six or eight months past; we are no longer its agents; we can do nothing for you."

Now, the point I wish to make is this—either the public should have some sure means to distinguish this sort of insurance agencies from those that are reliable, or the whole agency system should be abandoned.

I have purposely, Messrs. Editors, omitted all names in this, but should a further discussion of this matter seem necessary, I may perhaps mention names.—My own is at the service of any one who wishes to know it.

CITIZEN.

A REVERIE.

For the Memphis Appeal.

To-night closes the year 1858. With it dies many glorious anticipations, many fearful tragedies, many fierce conflicts of passion and reason, of hope and despair, of sorrow and joy. And as the still watches of night settle upon us, every breathing heart should be uplifted in humble, ardent thankfulness and rejoicing to the one great Protector. When sorrow's dread storm hung doleefully around us, His soothing voice cheered us amid the darkening and peril. When we knew no rest, no content; when happiness seemed only a mocking phantasmagora, a horrible delusion, the smile of faith and the dulcet tones of a Saviour's mercy, wooed us from the dismal spectre. Life was all an empty casket, a pompous vanity, until the blessing that "passeth understanding" gleamed upon the heavy spirit. But the year is closed! Its pealing knell is chimed through all the land. Gone, gone! and then a quick tear is shed to the sainted memory of what has been. Some hailed its advent with gay hilarity and some gazed adown its long weary vists with a holding sigh and care-worn brow. The grey-haired pilgrim looked to heaven and thanked his Creator that the boon of life had thus long been granted him.

The fearless adventurer, the daring statesman, the devotee of fashion, the sentimental poet, the sage philosopher, all greeted its approach with mingled sensations of joy and sadness. It has passed, and who will say that it has not brought anguish and deep sorrow to many a radiant household? Blest is the bosom that has realized no painful throbbings, no care or shame through its vast array of days and hours. Many who welcomed it with a glowing strain and a swelling heart, are with the pulseless hosts of the dead. But a thousand precious memories and enkearing associations are interwoven with the past year. A thousand treasured images and sweet day-dreams are linked with its golden hours. And as we list to the dying notes of its plaintive farewell, a mournful regret glides over the spirit, as for a blessing departed, a cherished thing blighted forever. The old year is passed, and as we muse of the hopes and the fair, beautiful visions that have while perished, a strange, solemn spell broods over all creation. But each one and all are floating onward and onward and onward on the mighty deep that sunders time from eternity. Year after year may sweep away, but we are destined ere long to reach that incomprehensible "bourn" from which no voyager shall return.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

For the Memphis Appeal.

"Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all."

Genobia, the renowned Queen of the East, has won the admiration of many nations by her wise government, her equitable laws, her great prudence, energy and zeal. She assembled her warriors; she led them before Rome's proudest chieftain; she fought with the sternest and fiercest, but when her country and crown were lost, she betrayed her most faithful friend, Cleopatra, the beautiful Egyptian Queen, perished by her own hand. The humble maid of Rheims, Joan of Arc, with the helmet and sword stood with the bravest for her King; but another has done more. Elizabeth, the far-famed monarch of old England—the ruler of a mighty realm—the woman of gigantic intellect, of soul-searching, soul-rousing, unkind, cruel and malevolent to the ill-fated Mary, Queen of Scotts, Miss Bremer, Mademoiselle Slael and many others have enrolled their names high on the catalogue of illustrious characters, but the name of Florence Nightingale shall be breathed with reverent fondness when theirs are forgotten. When the war-cry was heard deep and long on the plains of Sebastopol; when the angel of death unfurled his ghostly pinions and wast sorrow and dismay to the noblest bosom on that dread battle field, our heart shrank not, moved not, though the flaming bomb, the gleaming sword, the deadly ball were around her. She feared not, for

"Courage was cast about her like a dress
Of serene consciousness
A divine calm and an unruffled face
Did give her danger's grace."

With a calm brow she heard the rude taunt, and the scoffing jeers; derision and scorn might not baffle heroism like hers. But this was not the only impulse that enabled her to brook the terrors of so many storms. The deep-gushing fount of her soul's yearning sympathy and tenderness was stirred to its very vortex. Ay, she knew it was a woman's mission, to go amid the dying and toll of holy things, true and great, to light up the "dark valley." And who will not say that she reaped laurels, glorious and brilliant as any? She heard not the applauding shout, but when gloom and loneliness gathered about her, she raised her meek eye to the throne above, and quiet hope, and holy faith, were given her, that she might the more steadily struggle and endure. O, how her gentle presence cheered the faint, weary soldier! How her soothing voice nerved up his spirit and woke him from his dream of anguish and grief! Sweetly his visions floated back to his own "fatherland," his own anxious mother, and loving sisters. Then his fluttering soul saw dimly through the mysterious future—the unknown "bourne;" but he faltered not, for that devoted one spoke words which lit up the shadowy way. And shall her noble kindness be forgotten? Not while mankind is left to cherish one grateful emotion.

Causes of Sudden Death.

Dr. Wynne, in one of the lectures on medical jurisprudence, now in progress in the New York Medical College, called the attention of the class to the mistake generally prevalent in the causes of sudden death. These were usually attributed, often by medical men, either to disease of the heart or brain, whereas sudden deaths from diseases of the brain are rare, those from affections of the heart alone still more rare, while those from affections of the heart and lungs are not uncommon, and those from diseases of the lungs alone are by far the most frequent of all.

Of twenty-six cases reported to the Scientific Congress of Strasburg, by Dr. Tronde, there were of—

Apoplexy	1
Serous apoplexy	2
Cerebral congestion	4
Cerebral and pulmonary congestion	1
Hemoptysis	2
Foreign bodies in bronchia	2
Pulmonary congestion	13
Syncope or fainting	1
Perforation of intestines	2
	26

Of forty cases of sudden deaths examined by Devergie, the following were the causes:

Apoplexy	4
Serous do., with pulmonary congestion	2
Congestion of the brain and spinal marrow	9
Pulmonary congestion	12
Pulmonary and cerebral congestion	12
Hematemesis	3
Syncope	3
Rupture of heart	1
Rupture of pulmonary artery	1

THE STRATFORD GALLERY:

Or, the Shakespeare Gallerytrust, containing forty-five Illustrations, from the Rev. Alex. Dyce's edition of Shakespeare's Works.

This work has been so well kept in original as it is attractive. In no respect is it a mere reproduction of the "Shakespeare Gallerytrust," and "Heroines of Shakespeare," so well known to the trade; but, taking the same beautiful and rare materials the story-telling quality of Charles Lamb, and the characteristic illustrations of Mr. Kenny Meadows, the editor has judiciously kept both in view; and from page to page, as from picture to picture, he combines the reader's mind through her gallery, delightfully describing with story and sketches. The work is a counterpart, and fitting companion, to the "World-Famed Gallery of Fair Women," Queen Charlotte, and the "Equestrian Court" of Mrs. Grimaldi.
