SPRING IS COMING.

BY MARY HARRIS.

Spring is coming, with her flowers,
And her sunshine, and her showers;
Spring is coming, with her birds,
Hear the little lone warbler's lowings!

Blushing buds and crimson roses,
Shades, the larger truth disclosing
Spring has come to deck the heavens,
Spring is laughing thro' the dewens.

Over the green blades thick and hale,
Softly floats her golden hair;
And the blue sky pensive smiles,
As a maiden when she dreams.

Gentle zephyrs softly tread
Round pale winter's icy bed,
Whispering to the sleeping flowers
Of the happy spring time hours;

And the little birds are singing,
Hail! their merry notes are ringing
Ah! what melody doth float
From each tiny warbler's throat!

Hear, oh mortal, smiling Spring,
What a world of joy you bring
Every heart with transport greets you,
Joy to longer find sorrows you.

COLUMBIANA, Ala.

REVOLUTION IN HAYTI.

How Envy is Matter to the Fall of an Empire. Correspondence of the New York Tribune.]

PORT-AU-PRINCE, January 23.

This island, ever since its discovery by Columbus, has been famous for wars of races, and those sanguinary struggles have caused the expression "bloody scenes of St. Domingo" to pass almost into a proverb. The antagonism of the Indian race was characterized by cruelties such as probably have not been known elsewhere in the new world. The peopling of the island with negroes, their barbarous treatment while in slavery, and the terrible vengeance they inflicted upon their persecutors in their successful struggle for freedom, have all passed into history as scenes of reality stranger than fiction. The Haytian people are strongly imbued with the spirit of liberty, and have struggled perseveringly and at times sanguinarily to obtain and preserve it. Yet, from twelve years residence among them, I have found them possessed naturally of a mild and inoffensive character. They are considerably mixed up with European blood, and, in common with the other inhabitants of the new world, are generally of republican sentiments. Still, as if the genius of destruction—the spirit of war, bloodshed and ruin—would ever preside over their destinies, they have been three times cursed with tyrannical and bloody monsters in the shape of public rulers. The reigns of Christopher, Dessalines, and of Soulouque, have fearfully sullied the otherwise fair pages of their history.

But the friends of Hayti may now take courage, and hope that a radical change has come over her destiny. The reign of Soulouque, even worse than that of his predecessors, has terrible than any that preceded it in its barbarous ignorance and Fetich, bloodshed and financial ruin, has been overthrown by a moral revolution, effected without bloodshed. This revolution differs essentially from all preceding ones in Hayti, and for humanity, generosity, and elevated political sentiments, is an interesting example to the world.

The more intelligent of the citizens have for many years felt the necessity of a change, but were crushed by despotism, and forced by circumstances quite beyond their control, that they were driven almost to despair. The burdens become more and more intolerable, until even the ignorant masses, impoverished by the chief reliance of Soulouque, became fatigued with the oppression and their consequent poverty. They found that dancing, Fetich and pillage, which had so much delighted them in the early part of Soulouque's administration, did not profit them as they had hoped, and at last were glad to welcome as deliverers the very men whose pillage and destruction they had been taught by their chief to regard as a virtue.

In the depth of affliction and chaos through which the nation has been called to pass, many a man was led to most serious reflection. The aid of history and philosophy was invoked, and not a few resorted to the sacred Scriptures for light and principles to guide them through the struggle which they saw to be inevitable. The wiser heads consulted cautiously; plans were carefully laid; the Christian principle of forbearance, humanity—characteristic of civilization, rather than of corruption—was carefully inculcated by the leaders, and finally, on the 22d of December, Gen. Faustin Geffrard landed at the city of Gonaives, with four men in citizens dress, and called upon the citizens to join with him in proclaiming the Republic. This call was met with such a speedy and general response that the authorities soon found themselves under the necessity of yielding to the popular will, and, without firing a gun, in a few hours all order had in their power, and the efforts of the Republic were being carried by swift couriers to all the different Provinces of the Republic, and the chiefs of the Artibonite and of the North, all of which, in the course of one week, peacefully declared for the Republic, and all the political prisoners were set at liberty.

In the meantime, Soulouque and his satellites at Port-au-Prince were venting their spite upon all suspected of having any sympathy with the revolutionary movement. The prisons were crowded with the best citizens. Even women and children were not exempt, and the wife and family of General Geffrard was obliged to suffer the same humiliations; and, had it not been for the energetic efforts of the foreign consuls, many lives must evidently have been sacrificed. Soulouque went out with a confederate force to quell the rebellion and insurrection, and the pillage and murder of the Republicans was promised as a reward to all who should prove faithful to his cause. The consuls were fearful that St. Marc, where had it not been for the Christian spirit and wise statesmanship of Gen. Geffrard, a terrible destruction of life could have occurred, I have received advice with him to avoid the shedding of blood, and accomplish a moral revolution—the upon some outbursting and free expression of the will of the people. The young soldiers in the army with the same spirit of moderation, he succeeded in rallying Soulouque and his forces with only one man killed on either side. But a few days after, The Republic forces then made their way to Port-au-Prince, where, on the morning of the 15th instant, they entered, and proclaimed the Republic, without firing a gun. So great was the joy of the citizens that they almost thought themselves under the enchantment of a dream. It was on that very day that a band of citizens were to be massacred, and pillaged by order of Soulouque, who, at the last, he had fared for the destruction of so many, now obliged himself to seek protection in a place of safety. Soulouque, and his family, and was forced to acknowledge the generosity of the President in allowing him to escape from the force of an enraged people. He has, however, fled, evidently, by the Divine hand, as President Geffrard confesses, so quietly did he leave the Northern army enter, and take possession of the forts and cities, that nearly the whole population were awoke from sleep by the simultaneous cry, going up from every street and quarter of the town, "Vive la République!" "Vive la République!" "Vive la République d'Haïti!" "Vive President Geffrard!"

Even Soulouque was aroused from sleep, by the astonishing sound of the cry, a thousand times repeated, and, not dreaming but that the prisoners had been released from their bonds. The joy and astonishment of the people were unbounded, and to this time they can give no other reason for such an extraordinary deliverance than that which the President himself has given, viz: "It is the hand of the Lord!" While I pen these words heartily to this conclusion, I was nevertheless not surprised at this peaceful entry into the capital. Being on my return from a missionary tour in the north I was detained, for more than a week with the Republican army at St. Marc, and continued with them three days after leaving Port-au-Prince, during which time I enjoyed free conversation with the leaders of the revolution.

The President, was an old friend and contributor to our missionary establishment, opened to me familiarly his views of government and his plans of operations, and though I had already held him in high esteem as an intelligent and moral gentleman, it was in this critical moment that his superior qualifications as a General and statesman, and his noble, high minded and Christian spirit, shone forth conspicuously. It was his constant prayer that no blood should be shed, and the result of the graces of his character was that he won him the love of all parties. His name seemed hallowed with the very spirit of fraternity, whose influence was felt even in the camps of the enemy. I was, during with white flags, and were frequently met by large groups of the inhabitants bearing the sage, and as they saluted the President he would shake them cordially and address to them a short discourse, peculiarly adapted to encourage and instruct them. They also took it to be a favorable omen that the army had a soldier's entry into the city.

On the 23d inst., he took the oath of office as President of Hayti, and the rejoicings of the nation, which in this revolution has set a worthy example to the world. And as he is a man of family and society, of education and refinement, it is to be hoped that agriculture and commerce, education and religion will no longer be crippled by barbarous institutions, and that the people of Hayti may yet be elevated to the true dignity of their being.

I remain, dear Sir, truly yours,

Kossuth, the Hungarian Exile, in London.

A correspondent to Bonner's Ledger furnishes an extract from a letter he received from a friend made last fall, at the present residence of Kossuth, in London:

The Hungarian patriot is established in Upper Gower street, Bedford Square. He is in straitened circumstances, living on the proceeds of his lectures and contributions to newspapers, kind out by the remnant of his wife's $20,000, none of which was lost in railroad investments in the United States. Kossuth still is a mine of country and its institutions, and thinks he made a mistake in his visit here, in consequence of his ignorance of our affairs and the advice of interested friends. In Europe politics is taken a much more interesting, comprehensive, and enlightened sense. Orsini's plot against Napoleon's life, and Mazzini's local insurrection, are looked upon by the class of liberty, with mirror and assassination, as not only confidently expects the triumph in Europe and other lands, and whether he shall live to see it, appears to him a matter of small consequence.

The question what became of the $100,000 collected by Kossuth, in this country, is answered by the writer. Kossuth did not appropriate a dollar of it to his own use, but expended it all on the political objects for which it was contributed. By so and he sent agent after agent to Turkey, to negotiate military service to Hungary, two or three of whom were executed, and the vigilance of Austria rendered his schemes abortive.

"It is seventy years," says the writer, "since Kossuth left the United States, but he looks twenty years older than he did then. His flowing locks, then jet black, is now plentifully sprinkled with gray. He has grown very bald, and conceals his baldness by combing his hair on the top of his head. His face is marked with deep wrinkles, and the impress of care, and grief, and hopes long deferred, is deeply stamped upon his features. But his smile is as sweet, his voice is as deep and melodious, and the light of his dark eye is as soft and tender as in the days when he won the hearts of our people, and made the soul of the nation vibrate like the strings of the lute to the touch of genius and of skill."
