THE STATE OF EUROPE JUDGED BY M. GUIZOT.

Translated, for the National Intelligencer, from the Charivari Des Etats Unis.

The following is the article from the Journal des Debats, of which our correspondence has spoken, and which, with reason, is attributed by public opinion to M. Guizot:

"The organs of public opinion should not forget that they are not only responsible for what they say, but also for what they suppress; and that this silence is a heavy responsibility, when it might have been useful or possible to break it. If we could for a moment believe that we were interdicted from expressing the public sentiment upon the serious questions of foreign policy, which our preoccupies all the world, this forced silence would effect our patriotism, but it would not wound our honor, and we should consider ourselves freed from a duty impossible to fulfill. But we do not think it is so; we believe, on the contrary, that no one can with displeasure see us obey our conscience in telling the truth upon a question which affects the greatest interests of France.

"We do not accuse the French Government of wishing for war, still less of seeking it, and we believe in doubt, in the sincerity of its very pacific intentions; but we fear it may one day find itself engaged therein without desiring it. We see that some journals are prodigal of baleful counsels, and try to make the Government partake of their illusions. They represent the deliverance of Italy as a task as easy as it would be honourable; they imagine, beyond the Alps an ally whose power they overrate; they show another beyond the Vistula whose sincerity they guaranty; and, to complete the deception, they paint the east of Europe as pacifically disposed, while fully armed, to look upon the dismemberment of the Empire of Austria with a mixture of secret satisfaction and terror. We are certain that the French Government, at least as well instructed on the state of Europe as the enlightened public, is proof against these gross allurements, and, as a pledge of this, we have its pacific assurances recently given to us. The Government knows that they wish to deceive it in representing Austria as a contemptible adversary; it knows also that they seek to mislead it in deluding it with the neutrality of Germany. If necessary to take sides, the Germanic Confederation, without doubt, will choose Prussia as a guide, and the inaction of Prussia is much less certain than they affect to believe.

"No one is ignorant that the advent of the Liberal party in the government of that country, and the establishment of the regency of the Prince of Prussia, have not had the effect of separating Austria and Prussia. Quite the contrary; for not only have this party and its leaders a vivid sentiment of the military honor of their country, but their intelligence has penetrated with those ideas upon the unity and solidity of the whole of Germany of which the Assembly at Frankfort was the instructive but isolated organ. Whenever lately an Austrian journal invoked the support of Prussia, in the name of all Germany, representing the common interests, equally menaced, upon the banks of the Po and the borders of the Rhine, who will guaranty for us that these words had not an echo in the heart of Prussia and did not answer to its stronger feelings, but their interests as well as her passions, her alliances and her interests, impel her to this side. It is no secret that the sympathies of the Prince of Prussia with the eldest daughter of Queen Victoria has only been a sign of reconciliation between the two countries at the moment when England found herself in open rupture with Austria upon so many contested points of the treaty of Paris. It is in this, however, that those who wish to drag the French Government in their train triumph, and, with an incomprehensible security to those who see clearly, they cry on that they are assured of the partiality of England, it is not, in the first place, a singular presumption to be assured of anything in regard to a country whose affairs are not in the hands of the Government, of which is changed at will? One may, however, predict, rather let us say it is easy to see, that the mood of the English public does not justify this confidence; in her neutrality. Habituated for a long time in making vows for the liberation of Italy, in cursing the government of the Pope and the Kings of Naples, and in criticising Austria, the English public have been surprised to find a question which they had considered far off dropped suddenly upon them. It has appeared to be their a moment between its avowed sympathy for Italy and this great anxiety for the equilibrium of Europe, which is the invariable foundation of the English policy. But not more than eight days were necessary to show those who know the English public to which side it inclined, and, in supposing matters to be more advanced than they really are, the government, sufficiently sure of its ground, time than necessary to form its plan, and decide England to follow it.

"Without saying more, we think ourselves able to affirm that those who promise English neutality to the French government are deceiving it, or themselves deceived. Russia then remains, whose concurrence is looked upon as certain and irresistible. We do not, without extreme distrust, hear it said that Russia—so rudely tried by the last war, so pledged to industrial enterprise which demands the peace, so distracted especially by domestic reform, which resembles a revolution—shows at this moment any empressement to rush up a general war. We would more willing believe in her neutrality than her co-operation. But would this concurrence even be sufficient compensation for the sup-equivocal and, in the case, certain disposition of Germany and England? And is it a very cheering perspective to show on one half of Europe in arms against the other? We believe that Russia wishes peace, more than is thought, and, truth to say, not more strongly than almost entire Europe, which, in making war, would believe itself to be yielding to a cruel necessity. And, since those who so blindly push on France to undertake this war affirm that she will be disinterested, wishing to draw from it nothing for herself, we must include that the whole of Europe has everything to lose and nothing to gain in this great strife.

"A single State is the exception to this rule, and may think that it has some interest in unshackling the sword. This State may think that it has everything to gain by a war, where it may come out from it prodigiously aggrandized; it might flatter itself with having nothing to lose, or, in any case, Europe would not permit it to be materially diminished. Europe, by its own hands or by ours, never will there have best for a little State a more fruitful history of its misfortunes. Europe would not let it may hope to be free from a war contributions and the powers which would have seen its forfeit, with pleasure would not suffer its existence to be subjected, nor its independence seriously compromised. Can as much be said for the generous ally who would have shared its fortune? Piedmont, which has never concealed its desire to drag usalong with it, Europe natural and ill-disguised vows for war. This avowed disposition joined to the means of action which it possesses in upper Italy, and to the hopes it has there excited, appears just now to be the greatest danger which menaces the peace of Europe. Sardinia, by bolstering up Piedmont finds national support in our country among those utopians, unhinkabled partisans of universal peace, which they are always ready to back by a general war, among those impracticable artisans of our future regeneration, among all those, in short, who believe themselves inspired, for a crowd of good and bad reasons, in the boulevard element of Europe.

"There springs the concert of noise, excitement and false rumors; thence these fine proposed of Italian and nationality, which have left they object but to seduce the French Government, at least to compromise it, and to represent it as too far advanced to withdraw with honor, unless it wishes to be treated as the friend of the enemies of peace; it is not very profound, but it would not be the first time that unconscious and ill-disguised, aided by chance, shall have decided the fate of peoples. Be it otherwise, we have faith in the pacific declarations of the French Government. We are convinced that it will not allow itself to be those who wish to drag it into a blind lane, to choose between the care of its own home or that of the national interests. We are certain that it will not allow the fortune of France to be pledged, used in the hands of short-sighted agitators. Whatever may happen, we do our duty to the government and the public in telling the truth. If we yielded to the narrow spirit of party, of which we are sometimes accused, we should hold another language, or rather should keep silence; we have learned before to speak as become intelligent and sincere men, who in this crisis wish to show their active faithful interest of public tranquillity and devoted friends to their country. We need only to add, that we hope to be deceived, and if we must submit to this great trial, we have never hidden our sympathy for Italy; we will follow with an after-thought, and to the end, the banner of France, while making vows, as all good Frenchmen then should do, for victory and peace."

A ROYAL MARRIAGE.

From the New Orleans Picayune.

The marriage of the Prince Napoleon of France with the Princess Clotilda of Savoy, is, like most royal marriages, a political event to be studied more in relation to the policy of States than to the happiness of the wedded pair. Between the blase of twenty-five and twenty-eight, and a girl of sixteen, whom he has scarcely if ever seen, there can scarcely have been any bands of mutual affinities. Yet, the father of the bride is said to have been reconciled with difficulty to the connection, and is presumed political advantages. The bride herself may be supposed to be submissive, and hoped to be contented, but there is but little prospect of domestic happiness from such a union.

The mother of the bridegroom is, however, one rare example among royal women, of a noble nature, accepting the sacrifice of affection to a political necessity, and remaining faithful to her husband. Very strikingly the circumstances. When Prince Napoleon had disunited, by civil decree, the marriage of his brother Jerome with the American Miss Patterson, and was flushed with his annihilation of the power of Russia in the terrible battle of Jena, he demanded the hand of the princess of Wurtemburg for the Prince Jerome, and her father constrained her to consent. But having consented, she became the most dutiful and loyal of wives, to a husband scarcely worthy of so much devotion. When the day of reaction came, and the dynasty of Napoleon faded from Europe, his father discarded his son-in-law, and required his daughter to leave her husband. She wrote a most affecting and dignified letter of remonstrance, and escaped with some difficulty, to follow her husband into exile. Prince Napoleon is her husband in history of his mother's virtue should be to him a daily lesson of his duty to the young girl whom a like political constraint has brought to his care, without consulting her heart.

Politically speaking, the match is a remarkable one, and its possible consequence form agitating elements in the speculations of the future relations of the States. Between Sardinia and Austria, an intense rivalry exists for predominance in Italy. Sardinia represents a progressive and liberal policy—a degree of constitutional monarchy, which in Italy is liberalism, contrasted with the stark and repressive despotism of Austria. France, imperial in form, claims in Italy to be the patron of reforms, and is at conflict of policy with Austria, on the degree and kind of interventions each shall exercise over the Papal States. Outside of both, the republicans threaten revolutionary outbreaks in various States, in which the interest and policy of France as well as Austria and Sardinia to repress. Hence, a close family union between the French Emperor and the Sardinian King, indicates a close alliance in political objects, which will powerfully influence the fate of the whole peninsula, and the relations towards each other of the great powers who have territories and interests there.

The marriage is singular in other respects. It is the wedding of another Napoleon with another princess of the house of Austria. The nephew of him who effected the Archduchess from her conquered father, marries the daughter of another Austrian Archduchess, who was the wife of the King of Sardinia. There is a precedent for the alliance of the younger branches of the house of Austria and of the old. Prince Napoleon has not a throne to bestow—only the reflected power of a cousin; but this is a reunion which shows the repugnance of the oldest royal families for large mesalliances still remained. When there was a little more breathing room, Lord Napier appeared in the promenade, as also Secretary Toucey and Thompson, and Miss Lane, on the arm of Gen. Houston. The long list of beautiful and distinguished ladies present, obviates the necessity of enumerating them. Prominent as representatives from extreme sections was a lady from Georgia, well-known in fashionable circles of Washington, Mrs. Thomas Winans, of Baltimore; and of New England type, Miss Eames, of Providence. The East room was not vacated until near 12 o'clock. This concluded the fourth and last reception, and, with the exception of a large crowd, was but a prototype of hundreds of others held before it.

Burned to Death.

It is with feelings of regret that we are called upon to announce the death of an amiable young girl, the daughter of the Rev. Mr. McManus, Chaplain in the United States Army, at Fort Arbuckle, which took place at the Belle Grove Institute, on Saturday evening last. On Friday afternoon, as three of the young ladies were in one of the rooms at the Academy, Miss Maria McManus' clothes caught fire, and before assistance could be had she was so badly burned that she died the next day about 9 o'clock in the evening. As soon as she discovered that she was on fire, she ran, screaming, and Mr. and Mrs. Leslie rushed into the room, but the young lady was so frightened, that they could not get hold of her, so as to extinguish the flames, until she fell upon the floor. Mr. L.'s hands were badly burned in extinguishing the fire, and the poor girl's clothes were completely burned off to the waist, and her skin and flesh burned to a crisp. She was boarding at the Institute, and her father and mother are at Fort Arbuckle. As soon as the accident occurred, an express was dispatched for them, but too late for them to see their daughter alive. Her remains have been placed in a metallic coffin, to await the arrival of her parents.

This accident should be a warning to ladies, young and old, especially while hoops are worn, to avoid fire, and be careful while near it. It would be well to remember, that in case of one's clothes taking fire, to fall down immediately, full length, so as to prevent the flames from reaching the vital parts of the body, and to smother the flames. Presence of mind will always save any one who takes fire. As you value life, do not rush out of a room when on fire. Remember this.—Fort Smith Times, February 17.

Rapid Increase of Population.

Some idea may be formed of the rapid increase of population, from the following well authenticated incident, for which we are indebted to Mr. Langley, editor of the San Francisco Directory and the California State Register:

One day last week, an employe of Mr. Langley, engaged in compiling facts for his forthcoming directory, stopped at a house in this city, rang the bell, and found himself confronted with the proprietor, when the following dialogue ensued:

"Will you be kind enough to furnish me with your name for the directory?"

"Certainly; my name is ——"

"Have you a family?"

"Yes, a wife and a servant."

"Any children?"

"Wait a moment; I'll go and see."

In the course of five minutes the proprietor returned, and joyfully remarked:

"Yes, you can put down one boy."

It seems that his lady had just presented him with a son. The employe retired, his acknowledgments, and moved off to gather information elsewhere. About half an hour afterward he was returning through the same street, when he heard a baby crying in the house above referred to, and on going up, the gentleman remarked:

"Sir, you can put me down for two children."

His lady had presented him with another fine boy. The above is an actual occurrence, and but one of the many curious adventures that attend the business of a directory employe.

☞ The King of Sweden is in a sad state. His muscles have entirely lost their power, and he is not only unable to stand, but even to move a limb.

The Last Reception.

The last evening reception at the White House took place last night. It was the largest one of the season. As early as 8 o'clock the ante-rooms and halls were filled with a gay assemblage, and the constant rush of strangers to obtain an audience with the President was greater than on any similar occasion. The President was obliged to dispense with introductions from the Marshal, and receive the crowds with as much rapidity as possible consistent with the imposing stream of people. The presentations to Miss Lane were made as usual, by Deputy Marshal Phillips and Dr. Blake. There was the usual sprinkling of M. C's, etc., prominent among whom were Gen. Houston, Senators Jones, Allen, Hale, Dixon, while the House found numberless representatives present.

There was also a fair representation of the army and navy, while the large number of ladies present represented every section of the country—there being a large proportion of strangers. At 9 o'clock the East room presented a very brilliant, though crowded, appearance; so much so that an attempt to keep up the usual promenade was frustrated. At 10 o'clock the usual signal of departure from the band was sounded, but it only had the effect of thinning out the crowd—for large numbers still remained. When there was a little more breathing room, Lord Napier appeared in the promenade, as also Secretary Toucey and Thompson, and Miss Lane, on the arm of Gen. Houston. The long list of beautiful and distinguished ladies present, obviates the necessity of enumerating them. Prominent as representatives from extreme sections was a lady from Georgia, well-known in fashionable circles of Washington, Mrs. Thomas Winans, of Baltimore; and of New England type, Miss Eames, of Providence. THE STRATFORD GALLERY:

Or, Scenes and Characters from the Works of the Great Novelists. Described by Mrs. J. W. Palmer, I volume, imperial octavo.

The plan of the beautiful work is original as it is attractive. In no respect is it a mere reproduction of the "Shakespeare Gallery" or "Illustrations of Dickens," as well known to the trade; but with striking novelty and a complete originality, it combines the best points of the same by the graceful criticism of Mrs. Jameson. The editor has brought forth her little in view, and from page to page, as from gallery to gallery, delightfully directing through her gallery, delightfully describing with story and quotation. The work is a masterpiece, and fitting companion, to the "World-Noted Women" of Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke, and the "Republican Court" of Mrs. Griswold.
