THE SAD AFFAIR AT WASHINGTON.

Statement of Mr. Butterworth and Hon. R. J. Walker.

We published a day or two ago an abstract of the statement made by Mr. Butterworth, as to his knowledge of the circumstances attending the death of Mr. Key, at the hands of Mr. Sickles. Subjoined is Mr. B.'s statement in full, together with one from the Hon. Robt. J. Walker:

STATEMENT OF MR. BUTTERWORTH.

In consequence of erroneous and false statements which have appeared in the public press, in relation to the death of F. Barton Key, Esq., I feel that it is necessary that I should state the facts so far as I am connected with the occurrence. On Sunday morning, about 12 m., I received at the house of a friend with whom I was staying, a note from the Hon. Daniel E. Sickles, saying, "Dear B.: Come to me right away," which I showed to Hon. R. J. Walker and Senator Gwin, with whom I was conversing. I asked the bearer of the note, who was there, and said to my friends, "What can Sickles desire?" I immediately went to the house of Mr. S. On my arrival, I found Mr. Sickles in his bed room, lying on his face on the pillow, overwhelmed with grief. Some time elapsed before I could obtain from him an account of the cause of his affliction. He kept exclaiming, "I am a dishonored and ruined man, and cannot look you in the face." Finally he declared to me the following statement:

On Friday, Mr. Sickles received an anonymous letter, stating that his wife was in the habit of meeting Mr. F. Barton Key at a house on Fifteenth street, in a negro neighborhood. Through an agent Mr. Sickles had ascertained that Mr. Key had rented a house in that neighborhood, and was in the habit of meeting a lady there corresponding in dress and appearance to the wife of Mr. S. Being possessed of these facts he stated them to his wife on Saturday night. She said at once, "that she perceived that she was discovered," and thereupon made a full confession of her guilt in writing.

By this confession it appeared that the criminal intercourse had been going on since April, 1858; sometimes, in the absence of Mr. S., at the house of her husband; and that at the commencement of the present session of Congress Mr. Key had hired an unfurnished house on 15th street, where they were in the habit of meeting frequently.

After he had appraised me of the foregoing facts, he consulted me as to the course he should pursue. I adopted his view of his wife's guilt, which was written and signed, as I was then informed, by Mrs. S. in the presence of two friends and witnessed by them. I read the statement, laid it down on the table, and said I will go down town for a white and raven face wash, and return to you. Mr. Wooldridge then say so to Mr. S. if he should inquire for me. I immediately left the house and walked to the club, on 15th street, drank a glass of ale with a friend, and then went to my office in the house of Mr. Sickles. On entering the library again, Mr. Wooldridge informed me that Mr. Key had twice passed the house during the morning, and had a short time since waved his handkerchief three times as a signal. While conversing with him Mr. Sickles came into the library and stated that he had "seen the scoundrel making signals," and he added, "My God! this is horrible!" Said, "Mr. Sickles, you must be calm, and look this matter over coolly in the face; is there a possibility of keeping the certain knowledge of this crime from the public you must do nothing to destroy that possibility; you may be mistaken, in your belief that it is known to the whole city."

He instantly replied, "No, no, my friend; I am not; it is already the town talk." I then said, if that be so, there is but one course left for you as a man of honor—you need no advice. After a few moments' silence, Mr. Sickles said that he "was satisfied that Mr. Key had been in the habit of making h s signals from a window of the Club-house opposite; and what surprise him very much was that his wife strenuously denied this, though freely confessing her guilt." He then walked into the hall and said to me, "Come, go over with me to Stewart's room, in the Club-house, and he may be able to inform me whether Key has a room there, and for what purpose he uses it." I assented, and walked out into the street, supposing that Mr. Sickles was following me. I left the house for this sole purpose.

When I left Mr. S. in the hall, I am satisfied he had no weapons on his person. He was without his overcoat. He said nothing to me about weapons, or the probability of encountering Mr. Key. I walked slowly down the avenue, on the west side, to the corner, and as I was crossing the street I saw Mr. Key advance from a side pavement. He saluted me, saying, "Mr. Butterworth, what a fine day we have?" I responded, and said, "Have you come from the club?" He said, "I have." I asked, "Is Mr. Stewart in his room?" He answered, "Yes," and he is quite alone." I then said, "I am going up to see him good morning," and turned to leave him. As I did so I saw Mr. Sickles for the first time after leaving his house, coming rapidly down Sixteenth street, on the side next the square, and then near the corner. I had walked about thirty feet on my way to the Club when I heard Mr. S. exclaim, in a loud voice, "Key, you scoundrel, you have dishonored my house—you must die!"

I turned immediately and saw Mr. Key thrust his hand in his vest or side coat-pocket, take a step to the direction of Mr. Sickles, and simultaneously with the discharge of a pistol, Mr. Key then rapidly advanced on Mr. Sickles, seized him with his left hand by the collar of the coat, and seemed to make an effort to strike with some weapon in his right hand, which I then supposed to be a weapon. Mr. Sickles backed into the middle of the street, when he succeeded in extricating himself from Mr. Key's grasp, drew a pistol from his overcoat-pocket, presented it at Mr. Key, who retreated backward up Sixteenth street toward the club, and threw some thing at Mr. Sickles. Mr. Sickles followed, and when within ten feet fired. I saw that Mr. Key was wounded. He s aggered towards the sidewalk, saying, "Don't shoot me." He leaned for a moment against a tree, when Mr. Sickles advanced upon him, exploded a cap, and then fired a third time. As Mr. Key was falling, Mr. Sickles frequently exclaimed, "You villain, you have dishonored my house, and you must die." He uttered these words again, while standing over Mr. Key with his revolver in his hand. I took no part in the contest.

I believed them both to be armed. When I left Mr. Sickles' house I had no thought of meeting or seeing Mr. Key, my object being to visit Mr. Stewart. I had no arms with me. I did not know Mr. Sickles intended to take arms with him. He left the house after me, and without any suggestion from me came towards the club on the north side of the square. When Mr. Key saluted me I did not know that Mr. Sickles was approaching, nor did I see him until I turned to leave Mr. Key. I did not see Mr. S. shoot Mr. Key after his fall, nor place his pistol in contact with his head or clothing. After the third fire I advanced and took Mr. Sickles' arm, and conducted him up Sixteenth street, and advised him to go his house or the Attorney General's. He did so. I returned to the scene, and picked up an opera glass from the middle of the street and gave it to Mr. Sickles. This is the whole of my connection with this unfortunate occurrence. It is not true that I either sought or detained Mr. Key. He first addressed me, and our interview did not last one minute. I have known the late Mr. Key, in New York and in Washington, during the last ten years, and our relations have ever been of the most friendly character. I did not anticipate a collision on the Sabbath, though I did not doubt but that it would take place at an early day.

SAM. F. BUTTERWORTH.

STATEMENT OF THE HON. R. J. WALKER.

At the close of last week I came here from New York. Sunday morning, after breakfast, I visited the Hon. William M. Gwin and his family at his house, where I met Mr. Samuel F. Butterworth. We were conversing, when a servant came in and handed a note to Mr. Butterworth. He read them, after reading the note, remarked "Sickles wishes to see me immediately," adding, "What can this mean?" and I read as follows: "Come immediately, I need the aid of the time with Dr. Gwin, when, in the secrecy of an hour or two, some one—a servant, I think—entered, and said, "Mr. Sickles has just shot Mr. Barton Key dead." I asked what was the cause, when some one inquired of me, did you never hear the stories as to Mr. Key and Mrs. Sickles? I replied, No, never having heard their names connected in any way. I proposed, in a few moments, to go to the Club House, where the dead body of Mr. Key was said to be, and ascertain the facts.

Dr. Gwin's carriage being at the door, I drove at once rapidly to the club house, was informed of the death of Mr. Key, and that Mr. Sickles and Mr. Butterworth had gone to Judge Black's, where I drove at once, and was told Mr. S. and Mr. B. had gone to the President's. When on the way, meeting the Hon. John Slidell, I stopped the carriage, and on inquiry, learned that Mr. Sickles and Mr. Butterworth had just gone, or were going to Mr. Sickles' house, to which I proceeded at once, and, entering the back parlor, met Mr. Butterworth there alone. He appeared deeply distressed. They, together with my regard and sympathy for Mr. Sickles, my affection for Mr. Butterworth, my long and intimate acquaintance with Mr. Key, and friendship for him, so overcame me that I sobbed like a child. I could not speak to Mr. B. for several moments, when, at length, with deep emotion, he said: "My friend, you should not grieve so deeply; it is deplorable, but Mr. Key deserved his fate."

I then asked Mr. Butterworth to state the facts to me, which he did, warning the witnesses substantially as follows, as near given as the accompanying statement. I then said, the "meeting was not advised by you." Mr. Butterworth replied, "No; I did not expect any meeting that day, although I apprehended a collision as probable at some future period—but when or how I did not know, nor had Mr. Sickles ever stated to me." At that moment Mr. Sickles entered the room, when, after saluting me warmly, he threw himself on the sofa in a state of the deepest distress I have ever witnessed. His grief was so appalling, his exclamations so constant of the dishonor to his home, his family, his honor, and upon his wife and child, that I feared he would become insane, and thought of sending for a physician.

I quitted, however, with Mr. B. in endeavoring to pacify him, but we did not succeed for some time. At length he became calm, and, saying he was ready to accompany the magistrate—for whom he had sent, as I understood—Mr. B., Mr. S., the magistrate, (Mr. Goddard,) the mayor, (Mr. Berret,) and myself, all proceeded in the carriage to the front room of the prison, where, after a brief statement of the mere fact of the killing and death, Mr. S. was committed for further examination. Mr. B. and myself then drove to the club room, where the coroner's inquest was being held over the dead body of Mr. Key. At the club room we met Dr. Gwin, and drove with him to his house. Mr. Butterworth then repeated substantially to Mr. Gwin the same narrative he had given me, which narrative Mr. Sickles confirmed in a subsequent statement to me, interrupted by deep agony, about his daughter, and whom his wife, who, he said, was a mere child, adding that for their sake he might have tried to suffer in silence, without home or hope in this world; but after the signals and the disgrace became public, he neither asked nor wanted advice as to his course.

R. J. WALKER.

WASHINGTON CITY, March 1, 1859.

Taking Money Out of One Pocket and Putting it in Another.

The vetoed bill, on the contrary, was a measure to benefit the people at large. It contained a moderate grant of lands to every State in equal proportion. It neither took anything from the Treasury nor created any debt. The lands, valued at $7,000,000, would not for many years bring half that amount into the Treasury.

By this hypocritically defended and utterly unreasonable veto the States of Ohio lose four hundred and sixty thousand acres of land—a munificent fund for educational purposes, which would have been most acceptable and of great public service; Illinois and Indiana lose large obligations to this "Democratic" President, who longs for monarchical powers, and who neither confides in nor cares for the people.—Gazette.

So says our cotemporary of Morrill's land distribution scheme. The argument is particularly bright. We are told the bill did not "take anything from the Treasury," and neither did it create any debt—that the lands were about worthless, and would not in many years bring any considerable sum into the Treasury."

In the next paragraph it is declared that Ohio's share of the land would be a "fine endowment" for educational purposes, and would have been most acceptable and of great public service. That is what we call "blowing hot and cold in the same breath." The land is declared valueless to the General Government, but would be a fine "endowment" to Ohio. The law did not "take anything" from the National Treasury, but that nothing, when put into our State Treasury, becomes very valuable. These are specimens of the logic and argument of the Gazette.

Again our cotemporary tells us what Ohio has lost. It is 460,000 acres of land, which we are to get, in his opinion, without paying for it. Now the General Government has two sources of revenue—one arising from the duties collected on foreign imports, and the other from the sale of the public lands. The latter, in amount, varies a great deal. It has been as high as twenty-five millions of dollars a year, and it has been as low as two or three millions of dollars a year. Lately it has been about five millions of dollars annually. The discovery of gold in the new Territories, their organization and throwing them open to settlement, are calculated to greatly increase the sale of the public lands and make them more valuable to the Government. Morrill's bill, proposed to the States seven millions of acres, equivalent, at the Government price, to nearly nine millions of dollars.

We say give, but it was not a gift in reality. Additional taxation duties would have to be levied upon the States to make good this loss of nine millions to the Treasury. The people of Ohio would pay for their 460,000 acres of land by giving a higher price for whatever foreign or domestic luxuries they consumed. The revenue from the sale of lands would be less for the lands for nothing. These land distribution bills simply make gifts of land to the States, which the States pay for immediately in extra tax. The General Government is supported by the people of the States. It can give them neither money nor lands that it does not have previously to call back. Why then should the farce be gone through of taking money out of one pocket that has to be put right back into the other?—Cincinnati Gazette.

ACCOUNTING DISCOVERY.—The New York Tribune has discovered that money issued to pay the salaries of members of Congress in favor of the Land Distribution bill were from the free States, and the most of those who voted against it were from the slave States. It, therefore, intimates that the question was sectional in its politics. Now, the truth is, it was almost entirely a party vote. As the Republican majority of Democrats are from the South, it will find that every division of parties bears the same sectional complexion. The principles of the bill had nothing to do with North or South, but they did touch vitality one of the landmarks of the Democratic creed, which the Democracy of the North will never abandon.—Cin. Enquirer.

SMITH O'BRIEN.—A Washington letter, of the 24 instant, says:

The Irish patriot, William Smith O'Brien, this evening repaired to the residence of his friend, John Mitchell, Esq. Several Senators and Representatives in Congress have most cordially united with their friends in extending to the distinguished visitor the hospitalities. He visited the two houses of our National Legislature, to-day.

PROSPECTUS
OF a Weekly Newspaper, the publication of which is to be commenced at Grand Junction, Tennessee, on or before the 25th of February, 1859, to be called
"THE QUID-NUNC,"
J. P. PRYOR, Editor. J. B. SYNNOTT, Publisher.
The name of the proposed journal will, perhaps, sound peculiar, if not absurdity, to many; but upon examination it will be found not inappropriate, certainly not so objectionable as the "Gazette," which is a compound of the Latin noun, which, being translated, means "What are you?" and "Tattler," which is the 3d edition of his Highness, Grace the Duke, antecedent, as Editor.
"QUID-NUNC" ..... Our motto is know everything.
Just so; we intend to make the new paper "curious to know," and present to subscribers "everything" going on around us, that may be important to the community in which we live, and to the public at large.
We also intend to make the Quid-Nunc a vigorous and lively visitor to every family fireside.
In politics it will be perfectly independent of all parties, but non-committal on questions affecting the glory of the Republic, the welfare of the South, or the equality of the States before the Constitution.
The Quid-Nunc will join hands and hand in the cause of internal improvements, and in the great Agricultural movement now happily going on in this and the surrounding States.
Price of subscription, $2 per year; $1. No name entered upon our books without the cash in advance. No cash system will be adhered to rigidly. Address the editor, at Grand Junction, Tenn.
