TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW.

BY GERALD MAYNEY.

Sighs begin, that burden the stern sublime,
So does the heaven of Freedom;
And time begins persuaded in the time
We shall have rested then!
But never all we down, and say
There's nothing left but sorrow;
We walk the wilderness to-day,
The promised land to-morrow.

Our birds of song are silent now,
There are no flowers blooming!
Yet the beam in the frozen bough,
And Freedom's spring is coming!
And Freedom's tide comes up always,
Through we may stand in sorrow;
And our good cause comes onward to-day,
Shall rise again to-morrow.

Though all the long, dark nights of years,
The people go weeping
And refuse to rest with mind and tears,
Saying such sufferings entitled!
Yet few shall not forever stay
The many will in sorrow;
The powerful Right will come to-day,
But Heaven shall rule to-morrow.

Though hearts bleed over the past, our eyes
With smiling features glistens!
Yet, all our day hopes lay in the skies;
Look out your spirit and listen!
The world rolls Freedom's rained way
And (listen with her sorrow)
Earth's children hear her call to-day,
Sings wear the victory to-morrow.

Oh! Youth! thine earnest, with spirits,
With energies inherited!
To mark a heaven of desire,
Our yearning eyes a period!
And thinkest are servers by the way,
And hearts break in the furrow,
We'll have the golden grain to-day—
And harvest sunshine to-morrow.

Build to heroic lives, and all
Be like a cheerful zeal,
Ready to fall out at God's call,
Oh, children of labor!
Through and hill are toilers, and are
For ever in sweet service;
And 'tis the harvest-time to-day,
Bringe victory to-morrow.

THE FATAL SECRET.

Dr. M. lived in a village some distance from Cazra, in the south of France. One of his intimate friends was a M. Ambroise R., with whom he had been acquainted some considerable time.

The doctor had married a young girl from the neighborhood, who had brought him a portion of about a hundred thousand francs, which was given to him by the marriage contract in case of her dying without children. At the end of ten months the young woman was confined with a child, and the doctor appeared equally delighted as a husband and father.

Three years glided by. All at once it was said abroad that Madam M. had eloped with her husband's money, and Dr. Vicente, who had been burning all the evening, he invited the doctor to take the other, and went with him in the carriage. Ambroise, in accordance with the request of the doctor, both were to pass the night.

Ambroise got into the bed and blew the light out. The doctor also went to bed, but left the light burning. Ambroise soon fell asleep.

In the middle of the night he was awake by groans. Except by a little moonlight, which pierced through the blind, and cast a feeble gleam of light on a portion of his bed, all the room was in darkness. He thought at first that he had mistaken some dream for a reality, but the groans recommenced—they proceeded from the doctor's bed.

"Is that you groaning so, Louis?" inquired Ambroise. A fresh sigh was the only answer to this question.

"Are you in pain?" he continued; but a spasm of sob was all the inquiry produced.

"I say! Are you awake or asleep?" asked Ambroise, with a certain impatience, as he got up in the dark.

"I am awake," replied the doctor, "for the last eighteen months I have not slept."

"What do you mean?" inquired Ambroise, "I know I did see you asleep, you are too long a-bed yet, all, or it will be in death."

"What! are you in pain?" inquired Ambroise, "what can you have to tell me?"

"Wait," said the Doctor, it must be told in a low voice."

In the voice of his companion there was a tone so profoundly deep, that Ambroise felt all limbs shudder; he looked underneath the table for a match, but the door or hearing him move, and groaning like in extra, cried out—

"No, no! I'm right, or I'm not awake."

At the same time Ambroise heard him cramp down from his bed, and he ran to the window and drew the curtain, so as to intercept the moonbeam which fell upon the bed, after which he heard his feeling his way toward his pillow. He stretched out his hand, and it met that of the doctor. The doctor's hand was as cold as a hand of marble, and at the touch of Ambroise it was withdrawn with a violent shudder, withdrew his seat, but the doctor retained it with much force, pressed his lips to it, and as he same time fell on his knees.

"What, is he mad?" cried Ambroise.

"Do you expect nothing?" asked the doctor.

"What do you imagine I should expect?"

"Have you never felt that he who now holds your hand—who is on his knees close to your bed—is a wretch, is a thief, is a murderer—worse than all that even—a poisoner?"

Ambroise made an violent movement that he drew his hand back in spite of the firmness with which the doctor held it.

"Wretch!" he cried, "and why come and tell me that? Who forced you to do so?"

"Who forces me? How do I know myself? Is it God, is it remorse, is it my wife, is my child?" And he pronounced these last words in an almost evil-sounding voice.

Ambroise shrunk to the other side of the bed with horror.

"I? I, sir, I terrify you, do I not? But no matter. I must tell all; it stifles me. What I do, I do not know. I shall feel relieved, Ambroise, I have poisoned my wife! Ambroise, I have poisoned my daughter!"

Ambroise raised his two hands to heaven, and could only utter an ejaculation of horror.

"No one knew it; no one had any suspicion of it; no one would ever have had any; but I have found my conscience will no longer let me, at each moment the fatal secret is on my lips. Without doubt, it was some great criminal who first instituted the accusation against me. It was apparent to me that if I confessed my crime I should find solace. This morning, when you came for me, I thought of you; I appeared to me a warning from heaven, and from that moment I was decided. It is true that for a moment I failed, and when I was on the point of going away, if it had been so, I should have gone; but it was night, and at night I am afraid (The doctor stretched his hand out and seized that of Ambroise) I am afraid at night," he continued, "I am frightened."

"But why do you come and tell all these frightful things to me? I am not a priest, and cannot absolve you."

"But you are my friend, and can console me."

"Well, listen then," said Ambroise, approaching him; "I am going then, to speak to you as a friend, and not as a priest, since it is not advice, and not absolution, that you ask for."

"Speak, speak!"

"One day or other, your crime will be discovered." (The doctor shuddered.) "It will be the scaffold, the prison, or perhaps worse, the hulks. You have a father and a sister; your father will be dishonored, your sister will be despised by everyone. Take one pistols and go and blow your brains out in the corner of the wood of Marcilly. I will accompany you there, and no one will hear the weapon. To-morrow it will be said that you have been attacked by robbers and assassinated."

"And if, at the moment, my courage should fail, and I wound, without killing myself to

"Then write on a piece of paper that you are your own destroyer, place it beneath your pillow, and if you fail, why, I will complete the work."

The doctor uttered a groan, let go the hand of Ambrose, and fell back.

After a moment's silence, Ambrose said:

"Well, I see you are a coward! Go to bed, and say no more about it."

"Also—and—nothing of what I have confessed to you shall ever come out of your lips?"

"Wretch!" uttered Ambrose, "do you take me for a scoundrel like yourself?"

The doctor crawled on his knees to bed. Ambrose left the room, and went into his wife's chamber.

The next day he asked what had become of the doctor, and was told that he had gone away at daybreak.

It was six months before he saw him again. At the end of that period he learnt that the doctor had been arrested on suspicion of having poisoned his wife and daughter. The doctor's servant, who lodged above him, astonished to hear him walking about, going to bed and getting up again, instead of sleeping, came down stairs one night, looked through the key hole, saw his master on his knees in the middle of the room, and heard him ask for pardon from his wife and child. This servant was one who had come from his father-in-law's, and who was very much attached to his old master. He related everything to the old man, who was left entirely without family by the death of his daughter and grand daughter. The old man had his suspicions, but these suspicions had disappeared for several years. He had ceased to visit his son-in-law, and that was all. He was isolated and dying like a tree withering away in a corner, when the tale of his old servant came to wake up his former doubts. He asked the servant if he could let him hear and see himself that which he had witnessed. The servant replied that nothing could be more easy; that he would conceal himself in his room, and, as the same thing was repeated every night, he would only have to observe and listen in order to see and hear in his own turn that which he had seen and heard.

The plan was carried out according to the arrangement. The old man, convinced more by the paleness of the murderer, than by his own words, went the same night to the Procureur du Roi, and made his deposition.

The next day the doctor was taken into custody.

He had scarcely been arrested, when he acknowledged everything, and narrated himself the scene which had taken place at Marcilly, telling the Judge, as he had told Ambroise, that a moment had arrived at which he felt so much the necessity of speaking, that, influenced by a superior force, he had confessed everything. On the night preceding the day fixed for his trial, the doctor committed suicide, in prison, by opening the carotid artery; and thus escaped the public sentence to which he would certainly have been condemned.

THE BRIDE OF AN HOUR.

A SKETCH OF BATON BRIDGE.

The events I am going to relate happened when I was a mere boy, scarcely out of my teens, but I have seen much in the interim, and yet, too, have known her, but much is or. Where the unsemly heap of broken bricks and mortar have shown you lay, stone once a stately mansion. From whence bright windows, the sound of music and merriment nightly told of the life of pleasure its happy inmates led. It was about the time that Spain retroceded this colony (Louisiana) to the French, who sold it to the United States in the year 1803. Amelie was one of the richest Spanish gentlemen to be found in the colony; there was his life, and there he kept his sole pure treasure, his daughter Marie, or Marianne as Madame, as she was commonly named by her numerous admirers. Marie was the life of her old father—you felt it in her presence. Her voice, her step, the old bridge thought and drooped only of his daughter; to satisfy all her wishes, all her whims, was his continual study. She was accomplished, and she was beautiful. Marie at sixteen was fairly formed; a beauty; of petite stature, her hands and feet were those of a child; her raven tresses would have touched her feet, if freed from the gold comb that kept them twined like a crown over her well shaped head. Her large black eyes, that told of her Castilian blood, above with a light of wine, and while they revealed all the sweet gentleness of her soul, a sparkling glance would tell how deep was the passion which slumbered in her breast, and if ever was chasten sig, an arch smile played around her red lips, and her voice had a musical sweetness that went to the heart. No wonder then that she was the idolized of all admirers. Hundreds of young men sighed for her. Several duels had been fought by desparing lovers. Don Vicente had received offers from many aristocratic and wealthy families, but his invariable answer was that Marie would not be controlled by him, but make her own choice.

That choice was made at last. Charles De Mesnil, a gay young Frenchman was the happy mortal. He was young, rich and brave; he loved truly and said with all the eloquence of love. Marie's heart was his. The old father felt at first a kind of jealousy, when he saw that his daughter shared with another that affection which hitherto was his; besides, there were many gallant young Spaniards, in all the equals of De Mesnil. Why should his daughter choose a foreigner, and that, too, when he saw that Louisiana returned to the French, and he had resolved on returning to Spain. But when he saw how happy his child was; when he saw that radiant face, made more beautiful still by the light of love; when he learned to appreciate fully the noble nature of the young Frenchman, he would put no obstacle to their happiness, and from that day forth their nuptials

How quick the few months delay passed for the old man, and yet how slow time seemed to run for the young lovers. The eve of the great day at last arrived; numerous guests had accepted the invitation to the rejoicings, after the return of the happy pair from the church; Marie was to be married in the old Cathedral, where her mother had become the happy bride of Don Vicente. On that eve Don Vicente was seized with a violent fever, and the doctor pronounced his case dangerous. Marie wished to put off her nuptials, but the old man would not consent to it; he blessed his darling child, and an old friend and cousin undertook to lead her to the altar.

The ceremony is over; the happy De Mesnil claims his beautiful bride to his arms; they are in the family carriage, and the grand coach-man on the seat starts the horses on a short trot, followed by the numerous equipages of the invited guests. They will soon arrive; Paris which had given to that beautiful pair the bridal road? Whitmuche? Onward, onward! Alas! the mansion is on fire! Red flames thrust their curved tongues through the windows of the second story, and Don Vicente's room is in the stey above.

"Father! where is my father?" cries the young bride, springing out of the carriage. An unknown voice, one among the thousand bystanders, as one of them points to the closed window above. "Charles! my husband! Oh! save my father!" De Mesnil has disappeared. With presence of mind and coolness of action, he runs to an out-house yet untouched by the flames, and re-appears with a ladder which he rests against the window, and climbs and attacks it with repeated blows. It is open, and a dense smoke issuing from it tells the fearful fate that awaits the old man. Madame De Mesnil disappears in the aperture, and Marie falls on her knees, breathless, her eyes fixed on that window, her whole soul in the look with which she seems to pierce through the bridal dress, with her snowy veil hanging around her head, like the Angel of Mercy praying for some suffering soul. Horror! a loud noise is heard, and a volume of flame and smoke ascends from the burning house—the roof has fallen in! What a piercing cry of despair rends the air! The hundred crowd are awakened from their stupor; Marie has fallen senseless on the damp soil. They run to her; the doctor who was in the carriage gives her his cares; she revives, her eyes open, she looks around with a fixed gaze, and an unearthly laugh breaks from her lips. Marie is mad!

You remember having seen, not many years ago, for she died, I think, in 1859, a poor, decrepit old man, crouching in some occipal resort was the pooh of he old cath-dral. You have seen the little urchins run up after her, cry "Marie! Marie! Marie! Marie! Marie! Marie!" and if you ever spoke to the poor old crazy one, you may have not red that "Papa" and "Cuffee" were the only two words you ever heard from her lips. Poor old man! Long ago the playing of vaudeville little boys, depend at your door, or charity for her daily bread, and who was found dead one cold no more under the porch of the old Cathedral, was Marie de Almonde, the rich heiress, he forlamed beauty, the bride of an hour.—New Orleans Picayune.
