Man Shot Dead in the Street.

An Unfaithful Wife the Cause—Fearful Close of a Domestic Tragedy.

(Cincinnati Commercial, May 18.)

We are again called upon to record the particulars of another tragedy which occurred last night between the hours of eleven and twelve, at the Telegraph House, on Western Row, near Ninth, in which Richard Mahone was instantly killed by a pistol shot in the hands of John W. Clawson.

The particulars attending the melancholy affair, are vague and rather unsatisfactory. We relate the circumstances as given to us by a gentleman who was an eye-witness to a portion of its sentiments. Clawson, Mahone, and a friend named Adams, were in the above named saloon standing at the counter waiting for drinks, which they had ordered, when the conversation turned on music. Adams said to Clawson that his (Clawson's) abilities as a singer were small for a man who was pretentious. The latter replied that he could not sing, but could whip Adams if he would step out on the side-walk. Mahone and Adams turned and were proceeding toward the door, when Clawson drew a pistol and fired, the ball taking effect in Mahone's back, and glancing downwards, passed almost through the body, lodging an inch or so above the navel. Mahone threw up his hands and cried, "I'm shot," at the same time starting for the drug store of Chandler, Ross & Co., on the opposite corner. He reached the door of the store without assistance, but fell before he could cross the threshold, the blood pouring from his mouth in a perfect stream. He was picked up by those who followed, and carried in and laid on a lounge, but expired in a few moments. He regained his consciousness before his death, and when asked who shot him, replied, in broken accents, the blood still gurgling from his mouth, "John Clawson has killed me about his wife."

Clawson, after the occurrence, fled, but was arrested by officers Rees and Archer about one o'clock, together with a younger brother, named William, who is also implicated in the matter. They were both lodged in the Ninth street Station House, to await an examination, which will probably take place this morning. Coroner Carey was summoned, but had not, up to the hour of our going to press, gotten through with the inquest.

Clawson is a young man, not probably over twenty-four years of age. His trouble seem all to have accured from an unfortunate marriage. Six years are he led to the altar a young and beautiful girl of Philadelphia. The marriage was opposed by both his and her friends. The objections urged were their ages—she not yet fifteen, while he wanted three years before attaing his majority. Despite the warnings and counsels of friends, they married, and were married clandestinely. They came to this city, and for two years their lives were happy, but at last the thempter invaded the sanctity of their home, and the girl—though a mother, still a girl—again eloped, not as a wife, but as a mistress. She was soon forsaken by her seducer, and writing her husband, who still cherished for his erring wife an unalterable affection, a penitent letter, he received her again, with all her imperfections. Two years rolled away, she performing in the interim the duties of a wife and mother in their fullest sense, the dark spot on their marriage existence was almost forgot, when a fiend, more arch than the first, ingratiated himself into their household, and succeded in alloring her from the path of duty. This was the person, whom the husband killed. For a time stolen interviews were had, but of late the twain have lived together publicly as man and mistress.

Mahone is also married, and is, we believe, the father of three children.

Desperate Fight with a Villain on a Railroad Train.

From the Cincinnati Gazette.

We were yesterday made acquainted with the details of a most desperate act of villainy which was perpetrated upon the New York and Erie Railroad, on Wednesday night, and which doubtless had for its object the robbery of the United States mail, or the United States express. The certiculars are about as follows, as related by Mr. Adam Keck, the through Mail Agent, between this city and New York, who arrived here on yesterday morning's train.

It is well known to those who have passed over the N. Y. & E. R. R., that along the high embankments near Port Jervis, the trains run much slower than at any other point on the road, averaging only some eight or ten miles an hour. The Mail Agent and the Agent of the Express occupy the same car. Just before reaching the point designated, the former invited the latter to go to another part of the train to smoke a cigar. Mr. Keck declined the invitation, and soon after threw himself upon a pile of mail bags, and fell into a partial slumber. How long he remained so, he cannot tell, but probably but a few minutes only, when he was awakened by something falling upon his face, and upon arousing himself, he found a man standing over him with a sponge in his hand, saturated with chloroform, and although partially stunefied, Mr. Keck made a swing to his feet, and grasped the villain in a desperate struggle. The fellow drew a pistol and exclaimed with an oath, that he would shoot him; but the Agent fortunately got hold of the weapon before the the threat could be executed. A struggle then ensued, which, Mr. Keck says, seemed to last for half an hour, though probably not exceeding five minutes. Both were powerful men and both fighting for their lives. Every particle of strength was put forth for the mastery, until by a fortunate accident the contest turned up in favor of the Agent. In the struggle the villain was forced upon a pile of boxes, the upermost of which gave way, and the parties fell to the floor of the car together. Mr. Keck being uppermost. To add that he made good use of his vantage ground, would perhaps be unnecessary. Mr. Keck, although much exhausted himself, but blin until he begged for mercy, and apparently became partially insensible.

Thinking he had given him his quietus for the present, Mr Keck turned to seek assistance, and was in the act of pulling the bell cord to stop the train, when the villain made a rush to the side door of the car and jumped out, and must have gone down a rocky precipice of seventy-five to one hundred feet, at the foot of which runs the Delaware river. Whether or not he escaped with his life is not known, as the train was not stopped until it reached the next station, when Mr. Keck related the adventure with his desperado. When he arrived in this city yesterday morning, where he resides, his face presented abundant evidence of the use which the villain had made of his hands.

The design was, undoubtedly, to rob the mail or the Express. The messenger of the latter had in his possession $40,000 in money. In the forward part of the car is a water closet and a small office, with a door in the latter opening directly into the body of the car occupied by the agent and messenger. The desperado had worked the mail bags aside so as to give a view of the operations of the two men, and after the express messenger left the car, and the agent was supposed to be asleep, the fellow made the unsuccessful attempt upon his life. The head of Mr. Keck was pretty well chloroformed, and the probability is, that in applying the sponge, the villain, by the steady movement of the car caused it to touch his face and awaken him. A slungshot, which the rascal had placed on a box near the agent, was undoubtedly designed for use, when opportunity offered, but fortunately did not come in play.

During the scuffle, the bottle of chloroform with which the robber had prepared himself, was thrown to the floor and broken, and was diffused through the car. To the desperate struggle, boxes of artificial flowers, and various other articles, were broken, and the contents trampled under foot. The brakesman upon the train saw the man as he went down the embankment, but had no suspicion of what had so recently transpired in the mail car. The villain had accomplices on board, there is probably no doubt. Two men who purchased tickets in New York for Dunkirk, and who came up on that train, left it at some point above the attempted robbery, and returned to New York by the next train.

Mr. Keck, who is now at his residence in the Seventeenth ward, in this city, retained as trophies of his victory, a few yards of oil silk, a quantity of gutta percha, an overcoat and a pistol, which we have had forwarded to New York. He yesterday received a dispatch to return to New York immediately, but is not yet in a condition to travel. The oil silk and gutta percha were no doubt intended for a disguise, in case the attempt been successful, and here them until it should be safe to bring the money forth for use.

The villain had no doubt got upon the train before leaving New York, and secreted himself in the office of the car, but who he was is not known or conjectured. It is certainly the most desperate act of villainy and outrage that has been attempted in a long time.
