THE REMINISCENCES OF NAPOLEON THE ELDER AND YOUNGER.

The London Saturday Review has a very bitter and denunciatory article in relation to the reliance to be placed upon the word of the Emperor of France, those portions of which that purport to state facts, we copy as a matter of record for future reference:

The events of the past fortnight prove the French emperor to be fully as dangerous to Europe as they were a few years since. It is not now to be doubted that there exists a power in Europe capable of overturning the entire constituent. The Austrian Empire, which but lately did in the revolutionary war, is at one most stupidly misconstrued, but the task of interfering is exactly what it was. Russia, Prussia, and under all circumstances, the act of war has been more easily resisted in France than any other branch of inquiry, and we now see the reason. Napoleon's years of peace are severely rewarded by a hospitable of all the appliances and processes of campaigning, so consummate as almost to make up for the loss of that habit which battles have
