LOVE IN MAY.

When roaming in the Summer time,
When Nature hums with May,
And woods and walks young again
With music a pressed lay,
I wondered at the bonny brier,
And through the sudden rain,
And saw a maiden sit by the sea-
Beneath a sunny shade there.

She was as fair as bonny rose,
As fairer baby I guess,
Of all the bright and beautiful,
On whom the sun hath shone;
Her smile was like a morning beam,
Her voice was like a lark
That sings its dithyrambic notes
Along the misty rock.

Melancholy it was an angel sight,
The birds sang sweeter far,
There was a pearl in every flower,
A heaven in every star!
Peace breathed in the shades of silence walked,
Yet left us not alone,
For I had found my soul's delight,
And wooed her for mine own.

And all the love could ne'er be said
By silver lining lips,
Which sweeter and more that their there
For maiden's welcome cooed!
Bright flowers of youth and trees again,
Our dale and mountain wide,
To smile with cheerful beams upon
My siblings and my bride!

THE WORLD OF LIGHT.

BY REV. DR. MUHLENBERG

Since o'er Thy footstool here below
Dark twilight gems are strewn,
Oh, what must be the glory that shade thrown
My God! about Thy throne!
It cannot but be some faint dream of light—
There the full ocean rolls, how bright!

It might's blue curtain of the sky,
With diamond gems innumerable,
Were but a royal canopy
With glittering diamonds franged—
Ah, Lord, Thy temple's outer veil,
What splendor at the shrine must dwell!

The dazzling sun at noontide hour,
Forth from his flaming vase,
Winging far earth the golden answer,
Yet man can endure his blaze—
But thou, O Lord, one beam of Thine!
What, then, the day where Thou dost shine!

Ah! how shall those dim eyes endure
The light of heaven's ever,
Or how be fitted, as angels,
Upon the glory gaze?
Assist, O Lord, whilst we yet dwell,
And when we be that world of light.

SHADOWS, THEN SUNSHINE.

"Work, work, work!" I repeated the word to myself with bitterness. As I leaned out from the window to catch the sweet breezes of the morning as they swept across this green meadow lands, cool and delicious. Lines of misty, golden light were slanting down from the hilltops, making amber paths across the green, dewy fields, and darker lines of shade from tree top to another, through all the wide expanse of woods that my eye could reach. Under the window, roses and lilacs blossomed—the roses tossing their red and white, and the lilacs their closely purple clusters, backward and forward, meeting as if to exchange kisses, and mingle in one sweet breath their united fragrance.

But what were the sunlight, the trees, the dewy fields and flowers to me? I might not go out. Every morning I must sit down and press the green grass of the fields; I might not wander where the breezes made anthems through the trees; my hands might not pluck the singing flower which bent down to meet their weary outstretching. I must work, for labor was the only gift for me; whether I made it a pleasure or a curse, it was the only alternative.

And so with tears in my eyes, which the sunlight mockingly bridged across with golden rays, I seated myself to my daily task. There was a great well of bitterness within my heart, which, with the most rigorous will, I could hardly keep from overflowing—a passionate upbraiding of my deep, womanly nature, which, in vain I tried to turn heavenward into the quiet channel it had always known. In vain, for it surged up to catch the light and the shadows, the light, though it said the while there was no light, and the shadows, which, even in my bitterest moments, I shut my heart against. It was a strange time to me; one you comprehend it, reader? A time when I denied everything for a fear that was the sweet foundation of a hope.

"Work, work, work!" I said again, pressing my fingers close across my eyes, and letting fall the garment on which I had been sewing. "I wish I might die, die!" My tears fell thick and fast. I wished I might weep my life away.

"Nelly—Nelly, dear, you will wonder how long that there will be no rainbow after the showers instead of the rainbow, there will be a dull, heavy grayness upon everything. Look up, I have some great news for you."

Before the words fell upon my ear, I recognized a presence near me, a soul that mine leaped up in great waves of joy to meet. Words was not wanted to assure me of the presence of Charles Howard. In a moment the smiles gathered upon my face, and involuntarily I unclasped my hands from my eyes to meet the steady, penetrating gaze of the man I loved.

"Now, now, Nelly, we have the rainbow!" he said, drawing a chair, and seating himself close by my side, and at the same time tossing carelessly the light, airy robe which I was working among the table. "Tell me what troubles you?"

"For some reason the bitterness within me flowed up to my lips when I opened them to speak.

"I am weeping for joy," I said, turning my head away from him. "Is it to be wondered at?"

"Not if your heart in its outstretchings can alter the future," he said, smiling.

"Are you a prophet," said I, "that you speak with such authority?"

"I judge your future by my own heart, Nelly," said he. "I will not believe that it tells me wrongly."

I reached out my hand for my work, without replying, as he said this. A determination rose within me to listen coldly, with a pleasant face, to his words, even though they sent the warm blood dashing over my face, and quickened to stillness the pulsation of my heart. I was a poor, dependent sewing girl, and Charles Howard was rich, proud, and of high family. What I knew of the world, all the education I could lay claim to, had been gathered piece-meal; and yet I was not ignorant. He was elegant, polished man, at ease in any station—a man who had seen the world without entering into its busy, bustling ranks, and from seeing had turned away, weary and discontented.

From the moment I saw him, when he came to spend the summer with the proud Langdons, with whom I was living, I had chosen him wholly and well, as if for years I had been permitted to read his heart as freely as a written scroll. People said he was the betrothed husband of his haughty cousin, Letitia Langdon, and for me to what I saw daily, I had no right to dispute it. Indeed, I thought it very probable, and with me there was ever this sweet assurance—I could not, I could not love him, if he was wholly could not; could bring by my words a smile to his lips that this might try in vain to summon there. He might give her the hooks of his soul, the untainted make-believe devotion, but I could see into his inner life, and knew that not for a moment was her proud, arrogant face dagerreotyped there. He was by her side in all the glitter and fashionable society she loved, but he came to me for sympathy when he was weary and disheartened when the eyes of the world were turned for a moment from the worship of the idol.

But the day before the morning on which he found me weeping, Letitia spoke harshly and insultingly to me, taunted me on my low name and calling, and with the angry light in her dark eyes, told me if I dared to raise my plebian voice to speak to those above me, she would have me turned into the street like a beggar at a word. I have often wondered since how I bore so meekly without retorting her insolent words; for I could not, unless it was for the sweet love that had placed me, for the time, far beyond the reach of her taunts.

"I joined your future by my own heart," repeated Charles, attempting as he spoke to draw my work from my hands. "Oh, Nelly, did we hope that I have not judged wrongly?"

What right had I to trouble with delight at his welcome words? What right had the warm, self-tale blushes to write for his perusal my secret upon my brow, lip and cheek? I was poor, and what right had I to woman's love and joy? Charles Howard was a proud man—what could he want of my love? The thought was torturing to me, and with a quick, spasmodic effort, I said to him: "Do not, do not, Mr. Howard. I do not deserve this from you."

"Trust you, dearest!" he said, drawing me passionately toward him. "Trust you, who have proved to be nearer and dearer to me than any one else? when I came to you this morning to ask you to be my wife—my wife, Nelly?" he repeated.

"You cannot mean what you are saying," I sobbed. "You are rich, learned and proud; I am poor, unknown, and unloved. I am a sewing girl."

"Well, what of that?" he asked, holding me at arm's length from him, as though I had been the merest child, and looking half sternly, half-reproachfully in my face; "I am weary of pride, pompand show. I ask for the love of your true, womanly heart—a heart that has been kept pure and free from the corrosting dusts of the world. Give, oh, give me a home there, Nelly! If there is a condescension on either side, it is on yours. You are truer and purer than I am. Do not interrupt me. If you were not, your life could not flow on so calmly, so gently. I am a better man when near you, darling."

Oh, how like a bewildering, beautiful dream his words made everything to me! How rapidly and intuitatingly the assurance of his love went through the waiting chambers of my soul! Oh, how exquisite my hardships, privations, sorrow and despair, as for one little moment he drew my weary head to his breast, telling me that henceforth and forever it should be my shelter, resting place, and home.

"Ha, ha, ha!" broke through my golden joy the quick, musical laugh of Letitia Langdon. "Really, this is interesting! How lucky for me that I took a freak to rise early this morning. This beautiful, pathetic tableau, free of expense! Ha, ha, ha! Shall I summon spectators, Mr. Howard?"

"Just as you please, Miss Langdon," was the cool, carelessly-given reply, as he drew me back to my seat. "Perhaps your enjoyment will be increased, however, if you have the selfish pleasure of knowing that it is unshared by any one else!"

"Really, Charles, this is a little beneath you," she replied, in a conciliating tone. "Do not, I beg of you, trifle with this poor, unsophisticated creature any longer. Of course, it is perfectly excusable for gentlemen to have a right to seek amusement as they choose; but this girl, this servant of mine, really, she makes me blush that I am a woman."

"Come here, Letitia, and let me look at you while you are blushing," was the reply, given with a light laugh.

"Well, yes, anything," said she. "Only let this girl be sent to her room. This is no place for her."

A quick, fiery anger shone in Charles Howard's eyes at these words, such as I had never seen before; yet his voice was mild as he asked aloud to her, "Very well," and then whispered to me, "I'll take care of you, darling, do not fear."

But an hour later, as I was pacing to and fro across my chamber, Letitia Langdon came to me, her beautiful features darkened by frowns. I did not tremble at her anger, but stood silent, calm and proudly before her, waiting for her to commence the merciless tirade which she had in readiness for me.

"Well, what have you to say for yourself?" she began, her voice quivering with rage. "Answer me!"

But I did not care to speak, and so remained silent.

"Why don't you answer me?" she asked, with a stamp of her feet.

"First, I must know by what authority you question me," I replied.

"Girl, are you not my servant, working for the home I give you? Are you not accountable to me for your deportment?"

"If I do not please you, I can easily leave," I said, turning away from her.

"Yes, and leave me you should, but for Mr. Howard's kindness and pity. Foolishly enough, I have promised not to turn you out of doors. However, be careful how you conduct yourself or you will go now," she said, sweeping proudly toward the door. She stopped suddenly and added, "I have a few dresses which you may as well make for me. Mr. Howard thinks you will please us better than any one else."

I could but smile at her presumption as she closed the door after her. "Mr. Howard thinks you will please us," I repeated to myself, thankful that her insinuation had no longer power to ruffle the calm joy of my heart.

Two or three days passed away, and I did not meet or speak with Mr. Howard again. But for my trust in his love, my perfect faith in his every plan, I should have left the house of the Langdons, even though I was forced to sleep in the streets. But he wished me to stay for some good reason, and so I bore up bravely under insults that nearly bordered on cruelty. Letitia told me that he looked upon me with scorn and contempt, while he pitied me because I was poor and friendless; and so she must, out of courtesy to him, insist upon my sewing in my chamber, instead of the sitting room.

But one evening when I supposed every member of the family was making merry in the parlor, I stole down to the library for a book I had left there several days before. As I turned from the room to cross the brilliantly lighted hall, I met Mr. Howard. A sudden light broke over his face as he saw me, and with hand extended he came toward me, taking both my hands in his.

"I must not stay," I said, attempting to draw away from him.

"But a moment, dear," said he. "I am preparing a home for you. It will be ready soon. I am going away to-morrow. When I return I will take you away from this place. Keep in a brave heart until then. I will be back again in three days."

As he bent his head down to mine, I saw at the opposite side of the hall, peering from a door, the handsome, haughty face of Letitia Langdon. I had not time to signify by word or look to Mr. Howard that there was any one watching us before he said, pressing my hand to his breast kissy, "Three days, Nelly."

But his assurance did not make me happy. I could have wished that we might meet the same roof sheltered us both, but now for three long days I was to be left to the mercy of the cruel, revengeful Letitia. Some night just happen in this time I kept myself to sleep, thinking of it, and all night my dreams were shadowed by the face of Letitia Langdon, frowning in anger upon me. I was in the evening before, when it lowered upon my happiness. The following day there was this strange presentiment of evil with me, which I could not shake off. Mr. Howard's letter came in the morning, addressed to Letitia. I was sewing in her room when she came in with my, which I supposed was for him. She read it in silence, and then, with a sudden burst of passion, tossed it to me, saying, "Read it aloud."

"I will go at once," I answered, rising.

"Very well," said Letitia, "I will order a conveyance myself in time for the train, and have some one to assist you in packing your trunk."

In less than half an hour I was at the station, awaiting, half-impatiently, for the train in which I was to leave this place. Then, with a feeling of mingled relief and despair, I made my way through the crowd toward the carriage pointed out to me. As I stepped one foot upon the platform, some one spoke sufficiently by the arm. I looked around, and saw the wondering, puzzled gaze of Charles Howard.

"Where in the world are you going, Nelly?" he asked, drawing me back through the crowd.

"Home!" I said, faintly, as I leaned back heavily upon his arm.

"You are mistaken in the direction," said he. "Home is this way, dear, very near you," he added, motioning a coachman toward him.

"Home is in Memphis," I said, to the driver, as he lifted me into the coach.

I looked at him with wonder and surprise. It seemed like a dream to me.

"Do you know, Nelly, I am going home," said he. "That is our destination. I have procured a marriage license, and we come back earlier than I intended, because I felt sure you were troubled. What have they been doing to you?"

In broken sentences I told him the story of my persecution.

"Never mind, never mind," he said, "I will take care of you in future. But first I wish to have a better right to protect you. Everything is prepared for your reception in your new home, and we will be married at once, Nelly; so there will be no room for scandal. Heaven forbid that I should add to your suffering by my thoughtlessness."

I must have been a very fanciful bride to look upon, but my heart was as true and glad as need be. The following morning Mr. Howard sent a note to Miss Langdon, which ran as follows:

"Mr. Charles Howard presents his compliments to Miss Letitia Langdon, and begs that she will not forbear presuming her suit against Miss Nelly, since she did not listen to him yesterday as agreed upon. He hopes also that Miss Langdon will not allow any modest or unselfish scruples to prevent her from hearing, duly, the sentence he is doing if she is forced to the painful necessity of taking Mrs. Howard from her pleasant home to the jail."

This all happened years ago, in the time of shadows; I have now the sunshine.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

BY virtue of a fieri facias issued out of the Law Side of the Circuit Court and Chancery Court of the city of Memphis, in favor of Wm. Fowlkes, on behalf of himself and others, against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements belonging to J. Kirby, and to me directed, I have levied on the following described property, to wit: Lot No. 4 in square 27 of Lauderdale's addition to the city of Memphis, and all the interest of said J. Kirby in said lot, and on the 4th day of July, 1859, at the hours of 10 o'clock A. M. and 4 o'clock P. M. of said day, at the Court House in said city of Memphis, I will proceed to sell the said interest of said J. Kirby in said lot, at public auction, for cash, to the highest and best bidder, for the purpose of satisfying said fieri facias, and all costs and expenses per week and prices before buying elsewhere to see us.

☞ Customers will find a supply of Lance Mattresses not to be surpassed in quality, and the lowest in price.

CASH SYSTEM.

To our old friends and customers: Having purchased the old establishment of GEO. PHILLER & CO., late M. B. MILLER, No. 78 Front Row, I am now receiving direct from the manufacturer, a fresh stock of Hats and Straw Goods, bought for cash, which I intend selling at the same. An experience of fifteen years in the Hat business in Memphis has convinced me that the credit system will not do; that it is better to sell at ten to twenty-five per cent. less than to sell on time, and pay for his own Hat. I therefore respectfully solicit the patronage of my old friends and customers, and as many more as may favor me with their custom, and serve them to the best of my ability.

Stop the Thief.

STOLEN from my stables, six miles south-west of Raleigh, Miss., on the night of the 15th inst., a large NORREL HORSE, five years old, with both hind legs, nearly shod—the shoes very narrow at the heels; star in his forehead; his mane was cut off close from the low of his halter; the skin knocked off of one of his hind legs, near his hock. I will give a reward of $100 for the recovery of said horse, and apprehension of the thief, with sufficient proof to convict him.
