THE FOURTH OF JULY IN ST. PETERSBURG.

Correspondence of the New York Herald:

ST. PETERSBURG, July 1, 1859.

By the time these few hasty lines will reach you the excitement and incidents of the Fourth of July at home will have passed away, and the usual course of events again assumed their natural way; but some of your readers may be interested to know how the glorious Fourth was passed by our countrymen abroad, and the national feeling which characterizes the American when far from home, and when, after expense and long travel, they have an opportunity of contrasting and duly appreciating those benefits to mankind which are only to be found, and enjoyed under our own form of government, notwithstanding all its evils and political corruptions.

Arriving on the 1st of July at this great northern city of palaces and churches, with their mosque-like form and profusion of minarets and gilded domes and spires, nothing in outward appearance has the least interesting capital in Europe, and the nearest during the winter season, but now the most deserted during the two hot months of July and August, the inhabitants emigrating to the summer cottages on the numerous islands near the city on the delta of the Neva.

As it is generally necessary to call on our distinguished representatives abroad for information, size of passports, etc., I had the pleasure of finding Mr. Comstock, Caleb Cushing, Esq., secretary, and not only fully qual fied for his position, but ever ready and willing to assist and accommodate his countrymen, unlike many travellers who have accidentally wandered to this distant place, I have been the recipient of his kindness, and am under obligations for information, attention, favors and civilities official, which are the more appreciated as they are so seldom extended to a proper spirit by our political representatives abroad, many of whom are totally unqualified for the positions they hold—any credit to our country, benefit to our government, or service to their countrymen.

The weather on the fourth of July was a fair specimen of what we have at home, the thermometer ranging at 65 in the shade. While trying to keep cool in a hot place, and thinking seriously of home after a year's absence, I received a summons to appear at the Consul's residence at 6 p. m., where, at the appointed hour, were assembled fifteen Americans, most of them being temporary residents doing business in this city. A splendid dinner was prepared for us, and, when seated, I had the pleasure of seeing our national flag tastefully arranged over the balcony, and in the center were pointed the mystic figures 1776. It was the first time the American flag had been displayed in the outward world in the Russian capital, the government not permitting a foreign flag to be hoisted on shore in St. Petersburg, and it was quite interesting and amusing to see the native place with astonishment on that unknown flag and curious combination of figures, all of which was to them a mystery, and Mr. Croswell may justly feel pride in having first displayed our flag to the inhabitants of this great city.

Among those present were A. G. Goodell, of Philadelphia; Joseph Francis, of metallic lifeboat celebrity; Mr. Chandler, Captain Gray and Captain Perkins, of New York. The substantial good things being disposed of, Mr. Croswell rose, and after a few well-timed and feeling remarks, gave as a toast: "The fourth of July, 1776; the shrine of liberty; the cradle of what; give this day and the spirit which was responded to by Mr. Goodall in a very appropriate and pleasing manner. Numerous patriotic toasts followed, and although different parties were in attendance, there was but one sentiment, one feeling: devotion to our country and perpetual union. The last toast of the evening, being "Independence Hall, 1776," was given by Mr. Goodall, and received with much enthusiasm. The principal difficulty was to decide at what hour to separate, there being no night in these high latitudes at present, and for the first time we enjoyed the novel and beautiful sight of bright daylight on midnight as we were homeward bound from one of the most pleasant celebrations it has been our good fortune to enjoy on the fourth of July.

Mr. Pickens, our Minister, had a reception in the evening at his country residence of the distinguished diplomatic corps; but I was informed there were no Americans present, except the members of his own family and his Secretary of Legation.

The 7th instant was a great gala day to be recorded in Russian history, being the celebration as inaugurated of the bronze equestrian statue of the late Emperor Nicholas I, in the Mariski square, opposite the famous Isaac's church. The ceremony was one of the grandest sights that can be produced by military and imperial display, which, although interesting and gorgeous to behold, teaches the thinking American to be thankful to his Creator that his country is free from such a curse and blighting evil, which enslaves the soul and prevents the advance of Christianity and civilization. At 9 a. m. the troops began to assemble and form around the statue, and by 10 o'clock, 125,000 were in sight, stationed from the Winter Palace to the church, covering the vast Isaac's plain nearly a mile in length. Through the exertions and kind attentions of Mr. Cassidy, first seats were secured several of us, and accepted by a number of American ladies and gentlemen, giving us a fine view of the ceremonies. At 11 a. m., amidst sounds of bugles and music from all the military bands, the Emperor entered the square in a dashing style, in the uniform of the Imperial Guard, mounted on a fine spirited charger, and followed by his body guard, and, riding round the square, was greeted by showers of apple as from the troops and people. The state carriages of the Court passed through the square to the Isaac's church, the 8 at with the Empress, and drawn by eight horses, each led by a groom; the harness was heavy gilt and studded with brilliants and precious stones, and the carriage, having more the appearance of a golden canopy, was surrounded by the Imperial guard, of beautiful workmanship and immense value; the second carriage, drawn by six horses, was but little inferior to the first, and contained two of the grand duchesses, and in the other carriages were princes and noblemen of honor too numerous to mention.

The imperial carriage having entered the church, the ceremony of Isaac's consecration commenced by the high priest, assisted by a priest from in front, and dressed in all the rich, gaudy, golden robes of the Greek Church. At 12 m., the Grand Duke Constantine pronounced the blessing, when the thundering of cannon commenced from the thirty-five gun-boats stationed in the Neva, opposite the square, each mounting three thirty-two pounders, and the result was a general smashing of window glass on both sides of the river. The troops then formed in line and marched through the square in review of the Emperor and Empress, who was stationed under an awning near the statue. The troops were about three hours in passing, and as each regiment appeared with its colors and tattered banners, which they had carried or captured in battle they were loudly cheered. The militia display throughout was, I think, near perfection in the general fine appearance, dress and discipline of the troops, particularly the Cossack and Circassian cavalry. A night the large building of the Ministry of War, occupying an entire square, was beautifully illuminated; also the gun-boats on the Neva, and the interior of Isaac's Church.

The design of the statue is a copy after Mills' equestrian statue of General Jackson at Washington, the horse being in the same position and resting on his two hind feet. The figure of Nicholas is dressed in the uniform of the Imperial Guard, and sits in a graceful position. The statue is on a pedestal forty feet high, the lower part of black marble and the upper red Finland marble. At each upper corner is a colossal female figure in a sitting posture, representing Faith, Fortitude, Justice and Prudence. The bronze bas-relief is portrayed, that of Justice for the younger Empress; Fortitude, the Grand Duchess Olga; Faith, the Grand Duchess Alexandrine, and Prudence, the Grand Duchess Mary.

Below these figures on the four sides are bas-reliefs, also in bronze, representing: 1st, On front of the pedestal, a scene at the entrance of the Winter Palace in this city in 1825, when Nicholas came into power; the infant Alexander (the present Emperor,) is presented to the soldiers at the time of his double revolt. 2d. Represents the inauguration of industrial improvements into Russia; a railroad bridge with locomotive and train of cars crossing in the back-ground, and in the foreground are Nicholas and the Grand Dukes, dated 1837. No. 3 represents the suppression of Poland in 1832, and is composed of about twenty figures, with Nicholas and his generals on horse. 4 represents the scene in the Hay Market in this city during the raging of the cholera, when the Emperor, by his presence, arrested the fury of the mob and checked the massacre of the physicians by the serfs, who supposed the sickness was caused by the poisoning of the wells.

The monument and statue, taken as a work of art, are a failure, and particularly the horse and rider, which are far inferior to Mill's statue of Jackson or Powers' statue of Washington at Richmond. The entire work was executed by Baron Klodt, a German, and cast in the imperial foundry in this city, and cost about $400,000.

The new frigate General Admiral is expected daily, and there will probably be a general turnout again when she makes her appearance. The Hon. Mr. Seward is also daily expected, and it is sincerely hoped that he will enlighten his mind on the subject of the emancipation of the serfs of this country, the true condition of which has never been correctly stated by the political Abolitionists of our country.

Our commerce to this place has much increased during this season, and promises to continue so, being principally in the cotton trade, which is brought dirt-cut, notwithstanding the exertions of the English to have the cotton reshipped by themselves, using as an argument that they understood the quality better, and would not impose on the Russians.

LOSS OF COTTON AT SEA.

Those who have worked with any interest the losses at sea reported during the year, can scarcely fail to have noticed the great number of cotton ships burned at sea, and the immense loss reported. Our Insurance Companies have lost so heavily that inquiries into the causes of these disasters have been made. From those who have investigated the subject, and who are most competent to impartially judge, we learn that the disasters arise almost entirely from the use of oil and grease on and about the cotton presses and on board the ship. The evil of the first can be easily corrected, but otherwise it should be well considered by our Insurance Companies in their policies, and by cotton shippers. In the New York Ocean Cotton Press the machinery is entirely away from the press itself, and under ordinary circumstances oil cannot, in the slightest degree, get in contact with the cotton. Similar improvements should be adopted on the cotton presses in the South. The great evil apparently, however, to be in the use of cloth and grease in any degree so to cotton ships, and it may be suggested whether the adoption exclusively of some such material as soap for the purpose of packing the shafts and grease are now used, should not be made a clause in all cotton insurance policies. The cost of grease and cotton will produce combustion almost inevitably, and there is little doubt almost of anything better than a total loss of ship and cargo, if anything of the kind which occurs on board a cotton ship. To show the large number of vessels which have taken place in the loss of cotton ships, we have prepared, with labor, the disasters by fire and the losses on cotton ships from the beginning of the cotton year, September 1st, 1858, to the present time:

COTTON LOSSES BY FIRE ON SHIPBOARD FROM SEPTEMBER 1859, TO JULY 28, 1859.

Bark Oakland, 450 bales Charleston	$20,000
Ship Mary Ann Allerton, 1000 bales N. O. [illegible]	[illegible]
Ship Yazoo, 1100 [illegible]	[illegible]
Bark Thomas [illegible]	[illegible]
Ship Sigrist, 1800 bales [illegible]	[illegible]
Brig Sultan, 1024 bales	[illegible]
Bark Pr. 350 bales	[illegible]
Total	$[illegible]

It will be seen that the aggregate loss is nearly a million of dollars; or, taking an average year, about ten ⅌ cent of total yearly loss to our whole commerce; or a loss of nearly one-half ⅌ cent of the whole cotton crop. When it is considered that the cotton shipments form but a comparatively small portion of the total commerce, and that almost all of the losses are ships from the port of New Orleans, the magnitude of the evil may be appreciated. The comparison is still more forcible when we consider that the total shipments from New Orleans are only, on the average, 1,500,000 bales, valued at $90,000,000, making the loss (separating the New Orleans cotton ships from the others) over three-quarters ⅌ cent of the total shipments. Our insurers cannot afford these losses.—New York Com. and Fin.
