A SAD STORY.

We listened yesterday to the recital of a tale calculated to move the sympathies, and at the same time to awaken a distrust of mankind. We wondered as we listened if the hearts of men could become so hardened as to render them insensible to the misery and distress of their fellow creatures, who by their acts have been plundered of all they possess, their reputation ruined and their reason well nigh dethroned.

The facts, as related to us, are these: Some six months ago, a young man, aged about 22, came from Delaware county, in the State of New York, to this city for the purpose of obtaining a livelihood. He was the son of parents in moderate circumstances, and having friends in Milwaukie, had, by the advice of the latter, journeyed to the West. Young and ambitious, with a heart not easily discouraged, and an indomitable disposition, he deemed it an easy task to "make his way" to a comfortable state of circumstances in life, if not to an honorable distinction. He was possessed of an excellent education, and was regarded by those among whom he had been reared as a young man of more than ordinary promise.

He came to Milwaukie. The coldness of the times and stringency of financial matters rendered the obtaining of a situation difficult, but at last he succeeded in securing a place as clerk in a grocery for a short period. The time for which he had been engaged expired, and his employer, though in every way satisfied with him, had no longer any need of his services. Not in the least discouraged, however, he determined to try his fortunes elsewhere. He had a little over one hundred dollars, saved from the wreck of his fortune, and, bidding adieu to his friends, he purchased a ticket for St. Louis, where he arrived on the morning of the 9th of June last. By the aid of recommendations which he brought with him, he again obtained employment as a clerk in a large dry goods establishment at good wages. Things went on smoothly, and all was bright before him.

But one evening about the first of last month, he was enticed into one of the numerous gambling hells of that city by a brother clerk in the same establishment. That evening he was merely a spectator. Though frequently urged to play during the course of the night, he steadily refused; the principles he had been taught in his home sustained him. The night following he was again present, and this time he yielded to the entreaties of his newly formed acquaintance. He played; the stake was a small one, and he left the house with about thirty dollars in his purse than when he entered. He went home and thought over what had happened. Night after night he continued to indulge in his passion, his mind heated with excitement and the stimulus of the intoxicating cup. Secretly he frequented many places of similar character, and at the gaming table alternately lost and won. One evening about two weeks since he had lost all. The last farthing had been staked and was gone, and the discovery of his thefts stared him in the face. He applied to the winner for a small loan with which to retrieve his fortunes, and it was refused. Maddened and desperate he sprang from his seat, seized the chair in which he had been sitting, and with it struck his opponent a heavy blow, and ere those around him had time to seize him, fled.

He was pursued, overtaken, and immediately lodged in jail. The next morning the thefts of which he had been guilty were discovered by his employers, and the unhappy young man is now imprisoned in St. Louis, under the double charge of robbery and assault. The information of his crimes has been received here by his friends, whose unpleasant duty it will be to communicate the unwelcome intelligence to his friends in New York.

This is the "tale as true told to us," and who can imagine the woe of his parents and relations when they shall be made acquainted with his present situation? The young man, who, but six short months ago, hid them adieu, with prospects for the future bright and promising, and who they now believe to be happy in honest pursuits in the far West, is the occupant of a felon's cell, with perhaps, a fearful punishment hanging over him. The moral is plain, and we will no longer dwell upon the painful subject. Let young men take warning from it.—Milwaukie News.

LOVE AND LOYALTY.

There are scarcely any people who have had more cause to complain of the obstructions in the course of true love, than the royal house of Hanover, reigning in England. Owing to the disposition that prevailed among the princes and princesses in the last century, to marry families not royal, whereby that mighty Royal Blood might be contaminated, the Royal Marriage Act was passed in the reign of George III. This act declares, as stated in a long historical article in the Boston Traveler, that all descendants of George II should be incapable of marrying without the consent of the sovereign, until after completing the age of twenty-five years, when, having previously given a year's notice to the privy council, any such descendant can marry without the royal assent, unless both houses of Parliament, within that time, should declare their opposition to the contemplated marriage. Now it may have kept the royal blood very pure for the royal morals, at the scandalous illicit amours of the sons and grandsons of George III will prove. They have all fallen in love with English women, but have been unable to marry them. The consequences were very natural, and the Royal Marriage Act is partly chargeable for the scandalous lives of a good many English princes.

There are two first cousins of Queen Victoria still unmarried. One is the Duke of Cambridge, Commander-in-Chief of the army—a mature bachelor of over forty, who fell in love when young, and not being able to marry the object of his affections, by reason of the marriage act, he did as many others of his nature do, forbade him, and has a family that is never admitted to the court of St. James. The other unmarried cousin of the Queen is his sister, the Princess Mary, but who remains single though twenty years old, having been born November 27th, 1833. At last the Duke of Rutland, an English nobleman of great estate and proud lineage—traced even to royalty as directly and more purely than that of Victoria herself—has ventured to pay his addresses to the Princess, and she has accepted them. But report says that Queen Victoria objects to the match, and will interpose every obstacle to its accomplishment. As the Princess is past the age when the sovereign can positively forbid it, she may give the required year's notice to the privy council and obtain the consent of Parliament to her marriage; but the lover is not young, but in all other respects a much better man for an English Princess's husband than any of the German petty Princes that would like to marry her. He is the heard of the Manners family, and is said to have been the original of the Marquis of Beaumanoir, in Disraeli's Coningsby.

MISS CRUVEL.

It is announced that Cruvelli, has secured, among his artists, the famous Cravilli; but it can't possibly be true. She is the Baronne Vigier, the wife of one of the children of the man who kept the bath house in the Boulevard Paris, which bears his name to this day, much to his family's chagrin, who are not proud of the large conspiracy in which Mr. Vigier, père, made a fortune by furnishing cheap baths—his was a Beaman's on a large scale—and when Louis Philippe was distributing titles and orders with such liberal hand, the proprietor of the bath house had a handle put to his name by applying at the proper time of the proper person, and with a sufficient amount of money to overcome any understapper's scruples. He was made a baron, and sold his establishment in the proper time and future brought a large sum of money, and despite right to keep the name, "Bains de Vigier." No large lodging that the worthy old bourgeois did not resent the offer, though, in his own dignity, he was a little ashamed of his former business, and there the name is to this day. His children led the happy career which Paris permits to all possessors of plenty of money. One daughter married nobly, her husband very accomplishing the entree into the circle of the half-starved "Faubourg St. Germain. The son joined the jockey club, kept his horses, etc., and squandered many bank notes in pleasure. He was like all Frenchmen, "successful"—to every immoral acceptation of the term—and only found his match in the coulisses of the Grand Opera. There a heavy-browed, masculine young German lady, Mme. Cruvelli, met his advances with decorous severity.

Resistance fascinated him and young Mr. Vigier, becoming desperately enamored of the Cruvelli—or Cruvelli as she calls herself in the play bills—dangled about her for many months. Finally he proposed an elopement. This suited her books exactly. They eloped under peculiar circumstances. One night when the opera of Vepres Siciliennes had been announced and the hour for commencing had arrived, Cruvelli could not be found. The poor director was in despair. He sent to her lodgings, to the restaurants, to the Bois, to her friends and everywhere, but in vain. She was not, and they expressly say there. The opera of Robert the Devil was substituted, an apology made, and so the public was appeased. For this escapade, which was like little of all Paris, Cruvelli lost a brilliant engagement, worth $30,000 a year to her, and was fined a large sum for breach of contract. She went to Florence, was married there, and now is the Baronne in all the splendor of her eyebrows, the relat of her flight and the radiance which a title supported by the requisite fortune throws about everybody—even the most inferior of all earthly beings.

Since then, about three years, she has not appeared in public, except to sing for some charity. At Brussels she was married to her a trump card. The critics used to find all manner of fault with her style, etc., but they never denied the essential qualification, viz: a rich, mellow voice, which expressed brilliancy enough for the want of artificial method. Perhaps like Sontag, a husband's necessities have compelled a return to the stage. If so, it is the publicity fortune.—Boston Post.

A Modern Sardanapalus.

A letter from Constantinople, dated August 24, says the Sultan has completely beggared his government by the lavishness on his favorites. All the revenues of the empire prove insufficient to cover his personal expenses. He commands more money, just as the leech is said to crave some blood, wherever it may come from. Money he will have at all and every price, for the purpose of giving it to his women. The expenses of the Imperial Harem are incredible, and the debts of the Sultana's so-called sisters, as shown by a particular paper currency, which is bought and sold there, amount to millions. The women, called Sultanas, are the richest Circassian slaves. Each one has her little court, able to serve her pride, and to be provided for. The attendants of a Sultana number fifty to sixty persons, male and female, and in the Imperial Mistress's harem are upwards of three families in the harem. Thus, each son and daughter born to him, have the same retinue, entourage, with horses and carriages innumerable. Of course these women worry the life out of the Sultan for money, jewels, and backsheesh; often, to utter despair, have to be satisfied, and then from the scene of his persecutions to supply of his fair new looks, where he spends the afternoon, and it may there at nightfall, is taken home quite composed, to his seraglio. It is believed that the trip to Salonica, and his intended one to Egypt, had its origin in his domestic strife.

Others will say that the French had put him up to visiting Egypt in the time of their military prestige, so that he might see Lesseps's ship canal, and being impressed with its utility to the whole world and the rest of mankind, (the French,) order it to be continued. The war, however, having suddenly come to a termination, the English had a breathing spell, when the Sultan became impressed with the impropriety of the journey in the hot season, and changed it to Salonica, etc. Others are so wicked as to believe that, seeing the utter impossibility of checking the Sultan's career, his faithful Ministers strongly recommended the Egyptian visit, in the middle of July and August, hoping much from the heat of the climate, sea sickness, and the general weakness of their august master's health. This idea is carried out by the fact that Salonica is the most sickliest place in the empire, and that the Sultan's tent there was pitched near a marsh, where his Majesty, having slept three or four hours, caught a pernicious fever, from which it is uncertain whether he will recover. It is also said that some one has recommended gin to his Imperial Majesty as a certain remedy for the fever, and that he finds it excellent.
