THE TRUE LESSON.

From the New Orleans Picayune.]

It is a very careless use of words to describe the Harper's Ferry outbreak as a "negro insurrection," or "slave insurrection," as is frequently done by presses, which are really disposed to speak of it in the proper tone of indignation at the outrage, the actors, and their prompters. But these epithets give a false impression, which is well calculated to do mischief, by spreading perversions of the nature of the transaction in its southern bearings. It was not a negro insurrection at all—a slave insurrection at all; scarcely an insurrection at all, inasmuch as insurrection implies a rising of revolters against their own government. There were no Virginians, bond or free, engaged in it; there were no slaves at all, except one or two, who were seized and held under terror; not one negro or mulatto, except some intruding free negroes, loafing vagabonds from other States, and no whites but such as came over the line from various points in the free States, to offer up a disorderly which they did not foal. Instead of a Virginia insurrection, or a slave rebellion in Virginia, it should be more properly described as an invasion of Virginia by a gang of Abolitionists, dupes or emissaries of a treasonable fanaticism, going into a peaceful country to scatter "firebrands, arrows and death."

It is important to a right understanding of these transactions, their true character and effects, that this view should be kept steadily in mind. There is great power in words, and the familiar use of words which imply that there has been a dangerous domestic demonstration within the State of Virginia, against the slave institutions, is very apt to carry with it the associated idea of internal weakness—the liability to such outbreaks among the slaves—and, by easy transition, to a general doubt of the strength of slave institutions within the slave States themselves. It has been so used in the northern journals; and even rational and conservative presses speak of the "insurrection," as a sign of the general weakness of the institution—an eruption by rupture of an organic disease. The rabid Abolitionists speak of it in a tone of exultation, and insolently proclaim the approach of speedy emancipation, extended from the fears and demonstrated necessities of the South.

But the facts and the logic are both perniciously false as a demonstration against slavery. The Harper's Ferry foray was a total failure. The slaves on the border, among whom eager proselytes were expected to welcome the invaders, were found to be unshakenly faithful. Among the whole population not a pulse, except that of alarm for themselves from the fatal friendship of the ruffian liberator, was found to respond. Not a willing slave could be induced to join the conspirator—even in the darkness, to which he confided his secret purposes. When the end came, and the white desperadoes were all shot or captured, the survivors were constrained to avow that they were self-invited—missionaries of a creed to which they had disciples yet to find. They were not liberators of a complaining race. They meant to camp somewhere, in secrecy, and propagate the sedition, by degrees, out of which they might construct a civil war hereafter, and occupy themselves in the meantime with stealing away as many as they could induce or compel.

They found no insurgents. They made no converts, and the revolt they attempted, which dep ended for its success on the hope of an accession of multitudes of their own sort from other States, left them abandoned and helpless, suddenly overwhelmed by numbers, slain in the heat of a just wrath by an outraged community, or reserved for the death of unpitied felons on the gallows. They will die without having freed a single slave or made an impression on the loyalty of the slave population, or demonstrated for the use of secret sore in stilling a weak spot or a hopeful chance for renewing the mad enterprise hereafter.

Such an abortive foray is erroneously and mischievously misrepresented when it is heralded as a slave insurrection and made the text of Abolitionist triumphing, as having demonstrated the weakness and the terror of the South for its internal safety.

It is not therefore in its southern aspect and its present influences on the South that this affair is to be studied. The South is strong and capable of making itself stronger if not insufferable against this class of assaults; it is for the North to consider whether we shall have their co-operation, or be constrained to take measures for self-protection, on the faith that the whole North is an enemy against whom we must guard ourselves, without reserve or discrimination. The aggression comes from the North. The whole body of invaders of southern soil comes from the North. The leaders are all of the school of popular fanaticism taught in northern pulpits; inoculated by northern orators; laid down in the platforms of northern parties; promulgated and enforced in fervent harangues by favorite northern statesmen. The men, the promptings, the theories, the money, and the applause for their deeds, come from the North. The South stands on her defense to repel these assaults, and although she may treat this irruption with disregard as a feeble and impotent demonstration, it becomes essential to her future conduct, to her sense of self-respect, and her assurance of self-protection, that she should keep the secret of the combinations, the power of the sentiment, and the degree of co-operation for or against her, which she is to look for, and be guarded by, in her policy for herself and toward the North.

It is not that that outbreak gives us present alarm for the spread among us of the disorders forcibly obtruded into Virginia; but the spirit that prompted this is a monster to be met and throttled, or there can be no peace between us and our adversaries. And it is, above all things, necessary for us to know who are our enemies, and how many and strong they are. Here is a demoniac plot discovered, which daringly undertakes to propagate discord by bloodshed and riot, into peaceful communities, and though to be baffled, and the leaders crushed out, raises counsels with the plot the names of several potent public men of the North. They generally disclaim and denounce the association, but there is a mystery still unexplained, as to the degree of complicity, the source of the means, and the amount of the guilty confidence, which a thorough exposure of all the ramifications of the conspiracy would develop. But what we do know is, that violent journals at the North do sympathize with these ruffians; and what we cannot fail to see is, that this incendiary attempt, though made in madness and bewilder ed blunder, is the legitimate result of the teachings of northern pulpits, the platforms of northern politicians, and the fervent declamations of favorite northern statesmen.

Now it is not of so much importance to know who favored directly the plot that has failed, and is repudiated as a failure, as it is to know who is for the continuance of this warfare, in its widest sense; who are disposed to go on, and how far, in this anti-southern crusade, which treats up desperate minds to so shocking excesses; how far the judgment, the conscience, and the patriotism of the North will tolerate the disorders in the class of men as their leaders who have voluntarily, by participation or connivance, by actual aid or criminal silence, encouraged the atrocious scheme of robbery, sedition and murder, the catastrophe of blood and rapine, which Brown sought to create in Virginia; and how far they will continue to permit themselves to be misled by the demagogues of the pulpit, the stump, and the legislative chambers, by whose visionary doctrines, wild exhortations, and fiery denunciations, the popular mind has been heated to a frenzied hatred of the South, and their ignorant and desperate followers made to believe that they are doing a righteous work, and earning great rewards besides the little private gains they can pick up for themselves in the disorders they create.

Here is the real lesson to be drawn from the Harper's Ferry outbreak: It is a solemn appeal to the North, to the Constitution and to our common country, in its dealings with the Harper's Ferry rioters, and their counsellors, abettors and teachers.

The response has thus far, to this inquiry, is encouraging to the hope that the great body of the northern people are awaking to the peril of the position into which they have been unwittingly drawn by unprincipled and selfish men. May the event justify the hope, in the dismissal of the mischief makers from the post of authority, and the restoration of a constitutional rule of order, for the faction and frenzy which has brought the country into its present state of discord and danger.

INCREASE OF COLORED PASSENGERS.—Twenty years ago the number of colored slaves in Canada West was 3,000; now there are more than 40,000. In four months after the passage of the fugitive slave law 10,000 poured into the country.

ANECDOTE OF WASHIOGTON.

In 1754 he was stationed at Alexandria with his regiment, the only one in the colony, of which he was the colonel. There happened at that time to be an election in Alexandria for members of the Assembly, and the ballot ran high between Col. G. Fairfax and Mr. William Elgey. Washington was on the side of Fairfax, and a Mr. William Payne headed the friends of Elgey. In the course of the contest Washington grew very warm, (for his passions naturally were very powerful, though a wise regard for duty, i. e. honor and happiness, soon reduced them to a proper demand,) and unluckily said something to Mr. Payne, who, though but a cub in size, was a lion in heart, elevated his shillelah, and a blow, extended our hero on the ground. News was soon carried to the regiment that their colonel was murdered by a mob! Or, the passions of the soldiers, who doted on their commander, such a report fell at once like a flash of lightning on a magazine of powder. In a moment the whole regiment was under arms and in rapid motion toward the town, burning for vengeance.

During this time Washington had been literally piled with cold water, acids and volatiles, and happily for Mr. Payne and his party, was so far recovered as to go out and meet his enraged soldiers, who he knew had read him with faces of honest joy to see him alive again. After thanking them for such an evidence of their attachment to him, he assured them that he was not hurt in the least, and begged them, by the love of him and of their duty, to return peacefully to their barracks. As for himself, he went to his room, generously chastising his passion, which had just struck but a spark that had like to have thrown the whole town in a flame, and feeling himself the aggressor of Mr. Payne, he resolved to make the honorable reparation of asking his pardon. So sooner had he made this heroic resolution than, recovering that delicious gayety which ever accompanies good purposes in a virtuous mind, he went to a ball that night, and behaved as though nothing had happened. Early next morning he wrote a polite note, by a gentleman to Mr. Payne, to meet him at the ball. Payne took it for a challenge, and repaired to the inn in full expectation of smelling gunpowder.

But what was his surprise, on entering the chamber, to see, in lieu of a brace of pistols, a decanter of wine and a pair of glasses on the table. Washington rose to meet him, and offered his hand, and with a smile began: "Mr. Payne, to err is sometimes nature, to rectify error is always glory. I believe I was wrong in the affair of yesterday. You have had, I think, some satisfaction, and if you deem that sufficient there is my hand; let us be friends." A act of such sublime virtue produced its proper effect upon the mind of Mr. Payne, who, from that moment, became the most enthusiastic admirer and friend of Washington; and, for his sake, ready at any time to charge up to a battery of two-and-forty pounders. "Would our youth," says the narrator, "but be persuaded to act in a style so correct and heroic, our papers would no longer shock us with accounts of elegant young men murdering each other on false principles of honor, by one fourth of the time and talents lavished on all present pleasure and all future hopes."
