CHAUCER'S COUNSEL.

WRITTEN SHORTLY BEFORE HIS DEATH.

Flee from the press, and be so virtue true,
Thy foe shall have no hold to take you of,
To hound thine hatred, nor thine name pursue;
He who climbeth high enhanceth many a fall.
Hye's a shade that ever walks on valleys;
And on the sea that frowns most it will lake.
Trace not in life a vast expensive scheme,
But be thy wishes by thy state allied.
Be mild to others—to thyself severe—
So truth shall abide free, or from hurt or fear.

Think not of heeding all things to thy will,
Nay rather hope that fortune shall befriend;
Inconstant, she—but be thou constant still,
Whate'er betide, unto an honest end.
Too careless dangers never modly brave,
Kick not the naked foot against a nail;
Or from concern of the adverse storm,
It swell and pitiless stress which shall prevail.
Be in the career as in the outcheer's, clear;
So truth shall shield thee, of from hurt or fear.

Whatever happens, happy in thy mind
Be thou; nor at thy lot in life repine;
Be vinegar all if thou wouldst sweet find,
Nor every ne'er weather shall be always fine.
Rain, dry hours not here; a journey, this—
A pilgrim, thou; thou hie thee on thy way;
Look up to God, intent to Heavenly bliss,
Take what the road affords, and praises pay!
Stop broad ways, and seek the rough by high where,
So truth shall shield thee, or from hurt or fear.

The Late Battle Ground in Italy.

The Times' correspondent writing from the banks of the Mincio, on the 5th instant, says:

Any one taking the railway at Turin, and passing over the line by which the flood of war has rolled its waves from the Sesia to the Mincio, will have some difficulty in convincing himself that he is in a civilized country. The country which three months was the theater of a mighty war between three of the most powerful military nations of the continent. In vain will he look for all of those fearful traces of devastation with which he has been accustomed to couple the idea of war. Ruined towns and villages, deposoated districts, fields devastated and trees cut down, the absence or misery of the inhabitants, and flights of crows and vultures—nothing of the kind will be seen, but a country smiling, full of small towns and green fields, the inhabitants following their ordinary avocations, cattle grazing in the well irrigated meadows, or drawing the peaceful plow, as if war had never operated this fertile region, or as if every one had forgotten the mighty changes which have occurred since the spring. It will require some one who has been during the late war to point out to the visiter some bridge or other which has been blown up, and which has been only temporarily repaired with wood, or to draw his attention to some half-effaced mounds, indicating the line of earthworks constructed by the Austrians during their advance. He will pass over the Pozo Nuovo di Magenta without ever imagining the hard struggle of which it has been the scene. Even the railway station at Magenta would not attract his notice are it not for a succession of mounds surrounded by wooden crosses which fill the hollow on the other side of it, or a number of boys hawking about shapeless leaden bullets and small Austrian double-headed eagles in brass, or else a windowless house beyond the station, with some curious round holes through its walls. From Magenta to Deserzano he will find no trees, except, perhaps, a solitary French gendarme at the station at Novara. The omnibuses will be waiting for the truth as of yore, and those little nondescript carriles, with their jaded steeds, the remains, probably, of some of the migrating tribes which invaded the fertile plain of Lombardy in the beginning of our era.

At S-Sferino the houses of the village are as they have been, sufficient to trace. The travelers will climb up to the tower, and have a magnificent view, nothing to remind him of war, except a few bones sticking out from on the road, if he goes on, some loop-holes in the walls of the church-yard. This, with a few mounds which the officious guide points out as the burial-place of the Austrian dead at Solferino, will be all that will remind him of the day on which the second great battle of modern times has been fought. He will go on to Carriano, to the Mincio, and come back again, and, if he some up all he has seen, he will ask himself whether there ever was such a thing as an Italian war at all, whether all about it can be already obliterated and forgotten; whether it can be true that the country has changed masters not three months ago, and that those few Bersaglieri who talk about the Mincio or look down on Peschiera are set there to guard the frontier against the former masters of this country, strongly suspected to have still a considerable longing for it. In vain you look for any trace of the National Guard which would be more necessary in the second than in the first war, and where else, if for nothing else, at least to make all other troops available for fighting. You see some caps, blue and red, but nothing more. So close to the Austrian frontier, I need tell you that the people are more anxious than any where else to see that this institution is established; they don't feel comfortable at all in the vicinity of the frontier, but there are no muskets, consequently no drill and no organization; and yet the Mincio country, beginning at Lonato and Castiglione, might really have 4,000 or 5,000 men of this local force.

"Deprived, then, of the means of providing for their own internal security, and for emergencies, it would be but reasonable to expect that there was at least an efficient police force to watch these exposed points. No such thing; there is scarcely a carbiner in the neighborhood; in one of the most frequented points, like Deserzano, not one man. The result is that the latter place, above all, situated at a convenient distance from Peschiera, has become the general rendezvous of Austrian spies, where they can hold free communication with the other agents dispersed all over Lombardy. All these are now free to do as they please about, especially among the rural population. Such, at any rate, is the statement people make. But more astonishing than all this seems the fact that the whole internal government is still carried on by the functionaries named by Austria. The magistrates in the towns, as well as the deputazioni, are all those who have filled those places for the last seven or eight years, and from whom naturally it cannot be expected that they should be violently in favor of the new regime. If the people of Milan are leaning with this precarious and provisional state in which things still are in Lombardy, this is not quite the case in the place nearer to the frontier, where they are most exposed. They can less understand the reasons which induce the government to proceed slowly and warily, for they feel that they might be the first to suffer from it. No wonder.
