MESSRS. EDITORS: During a recent visit to the Sanctum of our learned friend, the late Postmaster-General, I discovered a little poetic gem, the creaturelisting of an intensely heart in memoriam, by his accomplished daughter. His mother, sensitive nature, like the tender vine, wondrous promptness in being ever twined, but for a more accidental occasion. Thinking it a beautiful tribute meet for one so young, I ventured to request a copy for publication; and, Mr. Editor, you will, at your request, oblige a friend.

LINES,

Written on receiving his "Appointment" after the death of his father's step-father.

OH! WHERE'S MY MOTHER?
On the spacious and stormy hills
Chill winter I gaze; I see no form
And long was my mother fill.
For I miss my father's welcome,
And smile and welcome give.
He walks I know, the unerring winds
Alone make and reply.

Oh! how oft, from yonder cottage,
With steps so slow,
He cast the shade our childish sports
Upon the hill.
But now his voice, merry form
Shows cold within the tomb,
And memory's dear hand plucked
In his enchanted bloom.

Oh, angels from your starry spheres
Look on us and bless
Us sleeping with and children,
Thy widow and orphans.
Thy [illegible] "Father of Lion, widow?"
Yes, we are, [illegible]
Can we not be, [illegible]
Be strength? Yes,
Yes, we are, [illegible]
And let us see him there.

Are you who with affection's wreath
Do their world of grief and care
When on mortal depart and be
Well, are where we dwell?
For that but called him from to rest
In life to dwell
Where he is, we'll meet with him
Where but we now depart.

CYNTHIA.

PRESENTATION AT THE FRENCH COURT.

How to get an Invitation—The Court Dress—The Presentation Ceremony—Opening the Ball—Princess Clotilde—Gloria—Prince Napoleon—Princess Mathilde—List of Americans Presented, etc.

[Correspondence New York Herald.]

Paris, January 30, 1860.

In company with about twenty other Americans I had the pleasure of being "presented" to their imperial majesties the Emperor and Empress of the French, at the second reception given at the Tuileries on Wednesday evening last.

The process of obtaining an invitation is very simple. You know that with the people of other countries, or at least of those living under monarchical governments, there is much more difficulty in gaining admittance to the presence of foreign royality than there is for Americans, the rule with the Ministers of the foreign nations being to present no one to a foreign sovereign who has not been presented to his own.

Any respectable American, however, who may be in Paris, by leaving his name at the American legation, will be pretty sure of obtaining an invitation to "pass the evening at the Tuileries," issued in the name of the Emperor, by the grand chamberlain. After obtaining this, the great amount of preparation is required. The recipient must, if he has any scruples about putting on a court dress, sacrifice them, as he will not be permitted to enter the palace without being attired in one, or in a uniform of some description. The dress worn by Americans is very simple, consisting of a blue dress coat, with a single or double row of buttons, straight unbroken collar, with embroidery upon the ruffs and on the back; white or blue pantaloons, with a gold band at the side, a white cut and cravat, patent leather boots, sword and cocked hat; or, if one happens to have a good coat, and is desirous of exhibiting it, he may wear tights and silk stockings and pumps, which, in the street court dress.

I found myself in the Salon d'Apollon, the room in which the presentations are made, and which was already brilliant with light and showy dresses and bright eyes, among which name shone more than those of our fair country women.

In this room were gathered Americans, English, French, Russians, Sardinians, Austrians, Turks, Greeks, a few Persians, and, indeed, representatives of almost every nation and clime under heaven, waiting to be presented to the Ministers of the different nations being present in their diplomatic costumes.

Mr. Calhoun, American Charge d'Affaires, and Mr. Wilbur, Secretary of Legation, were both present, looking very neat in full court costume, and Mr. Wilbur's calves showed to particular advantage, encased in his flesh colored silk stockings.

We were ranged around the sides of the room, and had the pleasure of remaining until a quarter past ten, when from a door at the end of the room toward the private apartments of the Imperial family, we heard the announcement "l'Empereur," and from a side door entered a long string of ladies of the court, preceded by chamberlains. After these came the Princess Mathilde in and the Emperor and the Empress, and following them the Prince Napoleon and the Princess Clotilde, and for about an hour the Emperor talked to the Princess Mathilde. The "presentation" ceremony was exceedingly simple. The citizens of each nation were placed together, and the ambassador of that nation, approaching the Emperor and Empress and bowing, called over rapidly but distinctly the name of each person in their suite who Their Majesties passed on their way around the room.

Of course the parties introduced bowed, and the Emperor and Empress kept up a continual bowing, and both wearing a very gracious smile, which seemed to indicate "we are very glad to see you." In this manner they passed completely around the room, not arm in arm, but the Emperor a little distance to the left of the Emperor.

The Prince Imperial was not of the party, the little fellow having probably received his supper and been duly sent to bed. The other members of the imperial family stood in a group near the end of the room, where they entered while the presentation was in progress. It is sometimes the case that their Majesties address a few words to some among the present party, but on this occasion neither of them spoke, and in five minutes they had gone entirely round, and then proceeded by the chamberlains, they again passed by us, and going through an angle-room, went into the magnificent "Salles des Marechaux," where the ball was to be opened. We immediately followed the court, and soon the rooms were crowded to such an extent that there seemed scarcely a standing place, by dint of following closely upon the heels of the imperial party, and a little pushing and considerable persuasion, I managed to effect what I desired—get a place where I could see the ball opened by the Emperor and Empress.

In the center of the "Salle des Marechaux" was a little vacant space about twenty feet square, surrounded by seats, which on these occasions, were filled by ladies in complete costumes, and sparkling with jewels, and redolent of perfume, and red with excitement, or perhaps with rouge. On the other side of this space, opposite the entrance, was a raised platform with seats upon it for the imperial family, and the space in front was appropriated to the dancers. Seating themselves for a moment, the party rose and took their places by the imperial quadrille, the Emperor dancing with the Princess Clotilde, with the Prince Napoleon and the Empress for their vis-a-vis. The Princess Mathilde danced with a Russian nobleman, and after the quadrille, during which, of course, all eyes were fixed upon the imperial party, they seated themselves on the platform before mentioned. The quadrille was not "dawdled" through with, as seems to be the fashion in these days, but danced with a good deal of energy, the Empress entering apparently into the spirit of it very heartily, and dancing very gracefully, while the Emperor was neither so gay or so graceful. How a man with such a weight as he has on his shoulders can dance at all, I must confess I cannot understand.

In seating themselves the imperial family were placed in the following order: On the extreme right was the Prince Napoleon (in the absence of the Prince Imperial and Prince Jerome, who is "most inconsolable to be the throne") on his left the Emperor; next to him the Empress, then the Princess Clotilde, with the Princess Mathilde, the cousin of the Emperor and sister of Prince Napoleon, on the extreme left. Behind them sat the ladies of the Court and the dames d'honneur of the Empress and the Princess Mathilde. The Emperor was dressed very neatly and simply, with a pale robe of a light thin tissue, trimmed with red roses, which she also wore in the wreath upon her bonnet. She had on a magnificent necklace of diamonds, and the usual quantity of crinoline. Although I had often seen her before, I never had so good an opportunity of examining her fair face and brilliant eyes as now. She is really very beautiful—beautiful now, even though she looks somewhat careworn and more serious than she should to show her fine features to the best advantage. She appeared very amiable during the entire evening, sometimes chatting with the Emperor, apparently upon some trivial matters suggested by the occasion, and turning occasionally to some one of her ladies of honor, or to the Princess Mathilde, and dropping a word or two and laughing. She did not leave her place after the first quadrille until the imperial party went to supper.

The Emperor was dressed in the costume of a general of division of the French army, with the exception of the boots, wearing silk stockings and pumps instead. One gets an entirely different idea of his appearance by seeing him on foot from the one obtained of him while driving or mounted. He has a long body, but short and "stumpy" legs, so that in walking he has an awkward air, while in riding he is very graceful. His waist, too, with his body bent slightly forward, and his head inclined a little over his right shoulder, which combination of effects makes him look particularly ungraceful, its face wears the same sphynxlike, unreadable expression for which he has always been noted; his eyes, apparently half closed, are nevertheless extremely employed in looking about him, and his forehead exhibits no immense development of what the phrenologists call "perceptive faculties." In conversing, however, with those about him, he wears a smile which was really amiable; and, taking him altogether, I must confess the near view of him not one more than ever into the condition which an Irishman would describe as "bothered entirely."

I stood and watched him for more than an hour, and he seemed to be in the center of two the dances, about the square in which the imperial party were fenced off from the crowd, trying to convince myself that the little, dumpy, half-asleep looking man, who, after years of wandering and care, stood behind at the head of the great nation—the man who had defied Austria and made himself the most popular sovereign France ever had; the man who had twice rently set loose from the bloody battle-field of Solferino—the man who had just given to his people over whom he rules a new and liberal commercial policy, who had in defiance of Italian freedom, flung his plaudit down before the visible head of Christendom—the man who, today, rules Europe, and whom oppressed nationalities, with uplifted hands and tearful eyes, but with hope-lighted faces, implore and look for help—that was he, that little dumpy man, standing quietly about, footsoldiering, but no one could have guessed from his face how much he had to think of and attend to. During the evening he passed once into the "Salle de la Paix," where the dancers were completely around it, stopping occasionally to say a few words to some one whom he recognized.

The Princess Clotilde, who sat next to the Empress, was dressed in blue, and wore a pearl necklace. She has a fair and girlish face, with a nose which we would call a slight snub, but to which the French apply the more delicate term of retroussé. She chatted and laughed a good deal with the Empress, danced four or five times, and seemed herself, principally during the dances, when she was not on the floor, by keeping time to the music with her head, in a very child-like, girlish manner. The report that she is in an "interesting situation" is devoid of truth, and it is even hinted that there is no probability she ever will be while she confines her affections to her lazy lord, the Prince Napoleon. But this is doubtless scandal. It is said there is not much love lost between the royal Prince and the petite Princess; that their apartments in the Palais Royal are quite distant from each other, and that they indulge in but very little family retirement.

She is said to be a petitish spoiled child, who considers herself sacrificed to a political alliance; while the Prince is proud and haughty, and thinks she ought to consider herself sufficiently honored in being "married" to him, a member of the royal family of Bonaparte, with a prospect, perhaps, of being Emperor of France. But then a girl of seventeen and a man of forty differ always as much as possible in the same light.

The Prince Napoleon was dressed like the Emperor, and, with the exception of when dancing the first quadrille, retained his place during the whole evening. He is a swarthy, fine looking man, and looked quite giant-like by the side of his imperial cousin. He has a fine face, much resembling his uncle, the first Napoleon; but for all this he is not popular with the French people, who regard him as a proud, [illegible] and call him "Plon-Plon," [illegible] "real, true Bonaparte," and refer to which signs [illegible] as a rather coarse [illegible] The Princess Mathilde [illegible] looking woman, about forty [illegible] and it is said to be rather "real," with a [illegible] blished that it is well the walls of her [illegible] in the Rue De Courcelles are not gifted [illegible] the power of speech. Scandal, probably—as scandal.

At midnight the imperial party and the diplomatic corps parlook of a supper, after which the magnificent supper room was opened to those who could get in, where an elegant supper, with plenty of champagne, was served. After supper the imperial party did not return to the ball room; but the ball was continued until a late, or rather an early hour in the morning. There must have been more than two thousand persons present, and the whole scene surpassed in brilliancy anything of the kind I have ever witnessed.
