FURTHER FROM MEXICO.

Capture of the Marin Expedition—Particulars of the whole affair—Miramon before Vera Cruz—Probable result of the Bombardment.

The following is the latest and most complete account of the Marin expedition we have received.

Some no less we have been put in possession of with the further particulars of the late affair on the Mexican coast, which resulted in the capture of the Gen. Miramon and Marquez de la Habana. With the steamers were taken six 24 pon ders, 2000 stand of small arms, 1500 shells, and other munitions of war in proportion. The prizes, in all, cannot be worth much less than $500,000, putting the steamers at their lowest valuation. The Gen. Miramon, however, is said to be very badly injured. The Saratoga's first broadside completely riddled her, and in her attempt to escape she afterward run aground. It was two days before she was gotten off, and on her passage up, she again broke down, and had to be towed inside the bar.

STATEMENT OF PRISONERS—DETAILED HISTORY OF THE EXPEDITION.

Four of the prisoners, Robert Dantz, Leon Ambri, Arthur Cowdry, and Jean Durand, all Frenchmen, have made a statement of the whole affair. They testify that they shipped at Havana on board the steamer Gen. Miramon, then known as Steamer No. 1, on the 20th of February. They were to have a month's pay in advance, another month's pay on their arrival on the Mexican coast, and a free passage back again to Havana.

They sailed from Havana the 26th of February, under the Spanish flag. After they got outside, however, the Mexican flag was raised. The crew now demanded their pay in advance according to promise, but did not get it. The next two days nothing of importance occurred. The third day the Marquez de la Habana broke down, and they were obliged to put into Sisal. Here it was that they fell in with the Spanish mail steamer Mexico, from Vera Cruz, and bound to Havana. Signals were exchanged, and when the vessels approached nearer they began crying "Hurrah for Miramon."

This, say the prisoners, was the first intimation they had of the character of the expedition. They did not even know that they carried materials of war. The cannon, small arms, ammunition, etc., were stowed away below, out of sight.

The next day, however, the guns were mounted, and both steamers perfectly fitted up as men of war. New clothing was also distributed among the crew, bearing the name of Gen. Miramon, in gold leaf. Some of the crew at first refused to change, but all finally yielded per force.

The expedition then continued its voyage. On their approach to Vera Cruz they hoisted a white flag, and sent off a boat, with a flag of truce, to inquire what the city was besieged. Commanding had been heard the day before. The guns were now charged and manned, and orders issued to lower the flag, if ever, the prisoners say, they thought the English colors were to be raised instead, as they had been several times during the trip by Feliz, in the harbor of Havana. This, of course, was not done. Both steamers made their appearance before Vera Cruz, as before stated, without any colors whatever. The captain said it was not necessary.

THE EXPEDITION BEFORE VERA CRUZ.

The steamers came in sight of Vera Cruz a little before noon the morning of the 6th. At twelve o'clock a boat was signaled from the castle as suspicious steamers. They approached the town from the sea, as if from the north, and passed within about a mile of the castle. A shot from the fortress ordered them to come to and show their colors. The United States sloop-of-war Savannah was then anchored near the castle. Some of the strangers refused to show their colors. They gave no more heed to her, however, than they did to the castle. She opened fire, and a brisk action followed, close to Anton Lizardo. At the former place the French, Spanish and English men-of-war were all anchored; but there seems to have been no communication between them, nor did they appear to notice the suspicious vessels.

PURSUIT OF THE STEAMERS.

As before stated, Capt. Jarvis immediately ordered Capt. Turner, of the Saratoga, to go in pursuit. The Saratoga got her way at half-past eight on the evening. She was towed down by Gen. Golomitz's steamship Indiana. Capt. Turner, from this point, and the steamer was a perfect stranger, an American vessel, but for months past in the service of the Juarez Government, as a war steamer. Each of them had Mexican and some English men on board. A portion of these were United States marines, entered thereon, from the Savannah on Friday, for the occasion.

MARIN'S AIM AT THE SARATOGA'S ENGAGEMENT.

The three vessels arrived at Anton Lizardo a little before midnight. This is a very safe harbor, some fifteen miles below Vera Cruz, and well protected by reefs on every side. Here Miramon had previously made a flag to indicate the place of rendezvous. Both steamers still had steam up, and seemed to have taken pains to be in such good their escape, if pursued. On the arrival, however, of the Saratoga, they were hastily engaged communicating with the shore, and, though the moon was shining clear as day, did not see her approach till too late. They were dreadfully frightened, and did not seem to be decided at first what to do or pursue. In the meantime, the Saratoga went out a small boat to demand their nationality. They fired upon twice, as before stated. The Saratoga then opened a broadside upon the Gen. Miramon, on board of which was Commander Marin, and came near sinking her at the first shot. The steamer returned the fire, but in the meantime got under way, naturally anxious to get out of so hot a place. The Indiana pursued and soon came up with the Marquez de la Habana almost light, but the Indiana's returned her fire, and finally boarded her at the point of the bayonet. It was in this engagement that the Indiana had her pilot-house carried away by a cannon shot. She also received other slight damage, but nothing to in any way disable her. Nor does any one on board appear to have been wounded, except Gen. Goicouria, who received a slight wound on one of his hand.

While all this was going on, the Saratoga was paying her respects to the Marquez de la Habana. This was the vessel that cleared from Havana as a transport. She did not offer much resistance. Another shot from the Saratoga brought her to, and then for the first time she hoisted the Spanish flag.

After this the Saratoga lay off Vera Cruz, until now in attendance on the Saratoga, ready to the aid of the Indiana, from which the Gen. Miramon was making a desperate effort to escape, after once being boarded. In her flight, however, she ran aground, and after a few shots, finally surrendered without resistance. She was not gotten off, however, till two days afterwards, and then only by the aid of her consort, the Marquez de la Habana. She was finally towed into Vera Cruz, by the Indiana, while the Marquez de la Habana had the unexpected honor of returning the compliment, by towing back the Saratoga.

WHO DID THE FIGHTING.

The French prisoners above mentioned declare that the resistance on board of both the captured steamers was done principally by the officers in command. They charged and discharged the cannon, while the crew, with hands and did most of the fighting. In this, however, they had the assistance of six or eight other officers, who came on board the steamers immediately after they made the prize. These at last, as indeed all the officers, are said to have behaved considerably at first, parading themselves on the deck with drawn swords, but finally to have fought bravely. Marin, in particular, fought like a tiger.

KILLED, WOUNDED AND PRISONERS.

The number of prisoners captured is not stated, and but few of their names are given. The two steamers are said to have had 250 men on board, and but few escaped. Besides all of those who came on board at Anton Lizardo were taken.

The number of killed and wounded was about 40. The former are said to have been thrown overboard at once. The latter were first taken on board the Saratoga and afterwards to Vera Cruz.

Of the 250 men, three-fourths at least are believed to be Spaniards. The rest were French, Portuguese, Americans, and Coolies from Manila. There were most of them, doubtless, ignorant of the real nature of the expedition.

The first engineer of the Marquez de la Habana was an American. He was killed by a shot from the Saratoga.

The first engineer of the General Miramon was a Frenchman. He was killed. The second engineer, also a Frenchman, was at last accounts still at his post, but under the command of an American engineer.

Among the prisoners are particularly mentioned Jean Ri Baraldi and the Abbe Chandron, well-known in Vera Cruz. The all-important captive, however, is Commodore Marin himself.

CAPTAIN TURNER'S INTERVIEW WITH MARIN.

When Marin came on board the Saratoga, Capt. Turner asked him why he had thus fired upon American vessels, without any provocation whatever, and in violation of every rule of honorable warfare.

Marin replied that his men were composed of all sorts of people, had been hurriedly shipped, were badly disciplined, and could not be controlled. He confessed that he knew the Saratoga's boats were sent out to demand the nationality of her signals, but protested that he did not order a shot to be fired.

He declared, moreover, that he gave contrary orders, but could not control his men.

Capt. Turner listened to these protestations in silence and then added: "You have been guilty of a great outrage. You alone are responsible for this unhappy affair, and upon you rests the responsibility."

Marin respondent meekly that he regretted it very much, whereupon Capt. Turner left him to his sorrows, and turned away.

Marin is said to have lived at Havana, while the expedition was being fitted out, in the house of the captain of the port, and all the prisoners declare that the arms, munitions and stores were put on board with the knowledge of the government.

VALUE OF THE PRIZES.

The Trait d'Union says that the cargo of the two vessels consisted of 1,000 fourteen pound bomb-shells, 1,000 bronze mortars, 4,000 small arms, and more than 50,000 rations. It is further asserted that the total expenditures of the expedition amounted to no less than $300,000, the greater part of which money was furnished by the Government at Havana, in conformity with the secret articles of the Ajuncia treaty.

If this statement be true, Capt. Turner has taken a rich prize.

He has gained, however, a far richer prize in the credit which attaches to the prompt and vigorous performance of his duty. The Vera Cruz papers are loud in his praise, and he will doubtless receive the same reward everywhere, from his own countrymen.

POWDER THROWN OVERBOARD.

A very large portion of the captured steamer's cargo is said to have been powder. During the melee at Anton Lizardo much of this was thrown overboard. Other stores also were thrown into the sea at least, if we can they would inevitably fall into the hands of the Americans.

A number of the barrels containing the powder were recovered. They are said to be the same as those in the arsenals of Havana. Other very conclusive evidences of the knowledge and connivance of the Cuban Government are said to have been discovered on the materials.

MIRAMON BEFORE VERA CRUZ—PREPARATION FOR THE BOMBARDMENT.

Our latest from Vera Cruz are to the 13th. Miramon was still before the city and preparing for its bombardment. Of the actual strength of the expedition we have but little addition to that already published. The number of his men is generally put down at about five thousand; his artillery at fifty to sixty pieces. Some six or eight of these are heavy mortars throwing sixty-eight and eighty-four pound shells. It is generally believed, however, that he was depending upon the captured steamers for both shells and powder.

However this may be, the works, as if in preparation for the bombardment, continued without intermission. Of these no accurate accounts are given. It is certain, however, that several batteries had already been planted on the 12th.

The principal works have been erected on what is called the Medano del Perro, some two miles and a half distant from the city. On the 10th and 11th, they were cannonaded from the city, and said to be badly injured.

While these works were being erected the besiegers, those of them not otherwise engaged, amused themselves with quietly surveying the city during the day, and sallying out in guerrilla parties during the night. Thereby the city was kept continually on the alert.

The encampment was but a short distance in the rear of Casa Mata, though the headquarters were still at Medellin. Thence, every morning, sallies out at an early hour a strong escort to the Alameda, which is followed by others at various times during the day.

The parties traverse the sand hills, overlooking the city, in every direction, taking care, however, never to get out near the guns of the city. Their movements are hourly watched, either from the walls or scouting by parties of horsemen, who are ever on the alert to give notice according to the movements of the enemy.

Prisoners are so daily being taken, or deserters daily come in, and from them the movements of the besiegers are very accurately known; while on the other hand, the affairs of the city are probably as well known to the opposing army.

From both the city and the works of the besiegers there is kept up an incessant firing throughout the whole day and greater part of the night. Sometimes also small batteries are sent out from the city to annoy the enemy at their works, and thus far, according to the daily bulletins, with considerable success.

The city of Vera Cruz is entirely deserted; except by the soldiery, who sleep nightly on their arms. Nevertheless, a most perfect confidence would seem everywhere to prevail in the ability of the city to make a successful defense. This confidence, also, has been very much strengthened since the capture of the marine expedition.

DEFENSES OF VERA CRUZ.

Vera Cruz is one of the strongest places in the world, and one of the most difficult to take. Its works of defense may be enumerated among the wonders of the world.

The whole exposed line of the city on the inland side is only about 1,000 yards, and this is protected by eighteen forts of huge dimensions, mounting from twenty to thirteen guns of the larger calibre each. The other works are as follows:

1. The old walls, or the original line of fortifications, connected together by nine of these huge forts, mounting some eighty brass twenty-four pounders.

2. A well constructed ditch running around the entire line of the walls.

3. The line of so called sand-forts, nine in number, constructed some sixty yards in advance of the original line of fortifications and mounting from six to twelve guns each. One of these forts, which is most exposed, mounts six sixty-four pounders of long range.

4. Outside of this second line of forts, the whole city is surrounded by a wire fence, nearly three miles in length. The special object of this is the better to protect the city in case of an assault. The wire is strung upon firmly-placed stakes, three or four feet from the ground, and such are crossing the other, it has the appearance of a chess-board. In itself it would be very likely to throw a house of men into confusion, if they attempted to straddle over it. But as an additional precaution, there has recently been dug, beneath each square formed by the wire, a hole, five or six feet deep, to receive the invader. Should he succeed even in straddling over the wire, the hole, dug for him, will inevitably receive him.

On the side of the sea the city is protected, as all know, by the celebrated castle of San Juan de Ulloa.

Miramon's capture of Vera Cruz is no easy task. He will have first, by a general bombardment, to make a breach in the walls and then encounter a double line of forts, the trench and the castle fire forces in the assault.

There is no doubt, however, but he will attempt it. In this all accounts agree. His works are rapidly completed; he has served on the representatives of foreign governments the usual notices to such cases; and all allow him to be a brave and daring, if not a reckless man, ready for anything that may can do.

Robinson, which deed is of record in the register's office of Shelby county, in Tennessee, in book No. 19, part 24, pages 81 and 82, which trust deed is referred to for the definition and description of the property, I will, on SATURDAY, the first day of March, 1860, at the premises, expose the following one or parcel of land to sale, by auction, to the highest bidder for cash, which said lot is described as follows: Beginning at the north-west corner of the lot of Jefferson Davis, No. 23, on Bradford street; thence westwardly one hundred and fifty-two feet to a sixteen feet alley; thence southwardly with said alley forty-three feet; thence eastwardly one hundred and fifty-two feet to a stake at the north east corner of a lot sold by R. R. Robinson to J. E. McCall, and thence northwardly forty-three feet to the beginning, being a part of lot 21.

I will sell said lot at ground, and the proceeds apply as directed by said trust deed. First, to the payment of the necessary expenses and cost of the trust aforesaid and the sale thereunder, and the balance, so far as it will go, so far as the same may be necessary, to when any payment shall be due on said notes, to P. T. Shaw's draft, dated June 4th, 1859 due at eight months after date, for sixteen hundred and sixty-six dollars and fifty cents, at the Bank of Memphis, in Memphis, Tennessee, drawn on and accepted by G. N. Robinson, and payable to the order of J. A. Mallory, and whatever remains thereof, will be applied to the payment of the other notes, to wit: Seventy-five dollars due first day of June next, and one hundred and fifty dollars due first day of June, 1861, and one hundred and fifty dollars due first day of June, 1862, with interest from date, and the balance, if any, will be paid to Mary C. Bradford's administrator, or to the heirs of said Mary C. Bradford.
