RIVER AND STEAMBOAT MATTERS.

STEAMERS LEAVING THIS DAY.

LOUIS SIMMONS, Capt. Kirk.....N. ORLEANS
ORE, Capt. Mayo.....CINCINNATI.

RIVER, WEATHER, AND BUSINESS.—The river continues to rise at this point yesterday to a ratio of 10 inches in twenty-four hours. The Platte Valley was the last arrival from St. Louis yesterday. Her officers report the Mississippi rising very rapidly lower in Cairo, with seven feet throw in St. Louis. The Illinois River is falling, with five feet water in the channel at Peoria. The Upper Mississippi is falling with four feet on the upper and 18 inches on the lower rapids. Below Keokuk there is five feet water at bad crossings. The Missouri river warbling from Weston down, with three and a half feet in the channel. We glean the following particulars in reference to the water in the Ohio river from the Cincinnati Commercial of Wednesday: The river was falling at Pittsburg Tuesday night, with eight feet in the channel. At Wheeling, there was twelve feet. At Marietta, the river had receded twelve feet altogether. At Cincinnati the river is falling slowly with eight feet four feet on the falls. Wednesday the Cumberland was falling, with only three feet on Harpeth Shoals. The lower Ohio is rising very fast—with seventeen feet on the shoals and bars—with the weather yesterday was warm, cloudy and sultry, with indications of rain. A fearful storm of thunder and wind, accompanied by hail and rain, came up about 9 o'clock last evening, and lasted about two hours with great severity. The storm, no doubt, did considerable damage to vegetation, and we might not be astonished to hear that the boats on the river in this latitude were injured. The storm continued, but with less severity during the night. Business was necessarily dull at the landing yesterday.

ARRIVED AND DEPARTED.—The Platte Valley, from St. Louis, and the W. H. Lumley, from the St. Francis river, were the only packets that arrived yesterday. The Platte Valley had a full passenger list, including a large number of the delegates from the great northwest to the Charleston convention. Her manifest embraced 3,000 sacks of corn, 300 bales hay, 300 bris flour, oil. The Lumley brought round 700 ties for Francis river bales of cotton, and considerable lumber, a lot of shingles, pickets, etc. The H. D. Mears, for Vicksburg, the South Reel, for Arkansas river, and the Platte Valley, for St. Louis, departed. The Mears had a fair freight and a large number of passengers. The South Reel also had as much in the way of freight as was desirable at the present stage of the water in the Arkansas river. She will re-ship at Pine Bluff for her port. The Valley, below, with fluctuations, the movements of transient boats at this port yesterday. The veteran Alex. Scott arrived last evening, but before the storm came up, and found a safe harbor here. She has ever been in luck, having escaped a nasty and prominent corner of fourteen years. The Magnolia and Atlantic passed Vicksburg, on a bit of a rush, at daylight, Wednesday morning, and were the boys at Vicksburg, last evening. The storm, no doubt, delayed their progress, and they did not pass up until a late hour. They were together at Vicksburg.

INCIDENTS.—We regret to learn that the Memphis and New Orleans packet company have transferred their contract for the transportation of the river mail from Memphis to New Orleans, to the St. Louis and New Orleans railroad line of steamers. This mail may, therefore, be expected on a reinforcement of the packet trade on the part of the old company.....We have not yet learned the particulars in regard to the accident to the steamer Moses McLellan, in Dutch Bend, Sunday last, but regret to learn that a number of passengers were injured.....The St. Louis Republican of Wednesday says that the officers of the the steamer Frank Rand, from St. Peters Tuesday, report a heavy hail storm on Monday evening, of five minutes duration, between Hamburg and Gladden, on Mississippi river. They were obliged to take the boat to save the hail from destruction. The hail stones were said to be as large as hen eggs, and any amount of them. The Frank came of safe however.....Capt. Wm. Johnson has purchased the Cedar Rapids for $8,000, as she lays at the mouth of Osage river. He will fit her up immediately for the Arkansas river, during low water. She will be admirably adapted to the trade, as she is of light draught.....The steamer Carrier had a portion of her cabin blown off in a storm, in the Missouri river, a few days since.....Capt. J. K. Johnson and Capt. Bob Robinson, of the Kanawha packets, are assessing for the sale of the steamer A. W. Quarrier, which left Cincinnati Tuesday evening. They will ship visit White river.....We learned last evening the rise in the river had needed twenty-four inches at Louisville.....The St. Francis Sun has been damaged, it will be remembered to the amount of $2,000.....Capt. Swallow, of the Kennett, was a passenger by the Platte Valley to this city yesterday.....Capt. Lockwood, of the steamer J. W. Cheeseman, was expected recently at St. Louis with a beautiful bowling piece, valued at $150, by the members of the steamboat gladiators' association of that city.....The St. Francis Sun, of Saturday last, and week ago, was up to the mouth of Wolf river.....The John Simons as still obstructing the landing.....A verdant young man, named James Henderson, from Bexter county, Ark., a passenger by the H. D. Mears, was robbed to the amount of $80 by some thieves yesterday, who made their escape.....The Linnie Simmons, last evening, had about 1000 bales cotton on board, and the Orb, for Pittsburg, to-day, had engagements to take about 1500 bales.

Boats Leaving To-Day.

FOR NEW ORLEANS.—The elegant new steamer Linnie Simmons, Capt. Kirk, will leave for New Orleans at five o'clock this afternoon. She is in every respect one of the most admirable passenger packets on the western waters, having unsurpassed accommodations, and double engines, insuring speed.

FOR PITTSBURG.—The fine steamer Orb, Capt. Moore, now in regular packet trade between Pittsburg and Cairo, will leave for Pittsburg, taking a limited amount of freight. She is popular both with travelers and shippers.

PRIDE AND PRINCIPLE.

BY E. SIMMONS BARRETT.

I was returning home after an absence of eight years, returning to the home of my childhood. The lumbering coach that bore me rapidly along, was already entering the village where I was born, where I had the first important principle of an education, where I had sported many a happy childhood's hour, and where I had first learned to love.

Yes, to love, the prettiest, merriest and prondest maiden in all the village—"not wisely but too well." She rejected my overtures had higher aspirations. It was true, she liked me very well—it might be, loved me—I was not rich, and she was proud and haughty as well as beautiful. Yet she was kind, indeed, kind and charitable, she did not reject my offer disdainfully, but seemed to study some method by which her irreversible reply might give me no pain.

I did not question her motives. I knew them too well, and then and there I resolved, that if possible, she should be spared me, I would depart at once from my native village, and some day return a wealthy man—not again to urge my suit, not even to claim her as a friend or acquaintance, but to show her that I, the poor poor boy, for I too had a proud spirit, and could never condescend to plead with a woman.

All these thoughts passed rapidly through my mind, as I neared my father's cottage; and I rejoiced to think that, in part, my purpose had been accomplished. I was rich—not even beyond the fastidious requisitions of Isabel Hayne, richer than her father had ever been, and yet my stern resolve had seen no change.

I met my father, now silver-haired with age. My mother had been lying in her narrow, silent home for nearly two years. My sister, my only sister, dearly loved and hoped to meet, was married, and had gone to a distant place to dwell. The spirit of change had breathed upon every dear and familiar object. The house, the flowers were mouldering away. I met the companions of my youth, who welcomed me back with smiles that seemed the detected mockery of the smiles that lit up their happy faces in my boyhood's days. They were growing old.

Yet some seemed apparently no older than when I had seen them eight years before.

I did not meet Miss Hayne, nor did I even inquire about her. She had probably gone away, as I had, and perhaps, as probable, her father might have become so wealthy that she no longer moved in the village society. Perhaps she was married, and was living in some other place. What was she to me that I should spend a thought in speculation as to the cause of her instability? And yet I could not efface her image from my mind. If ever in distant lands I had succeeded in my efforts to banish her from my memory, I could not do so now. The associations of boyhood familiar scenes brought back the recollections of happy days—and her name, her form, just as she appeared to me then, was indispensable to complete the picture which fancy painted me.

There was a social gathering at a friend's, but she was not there. Why should I look so anxiously about, hoping and yet fearing to encounter her beautiful face? Why could I not forget her at once and forever.

Some one mentioned her name. "Why was she not there?"

"She does not go now since their misfortune."

"What a pity! Poor Hayne! They say that she supports him by teaching a female school."

"Yes, she is engaged in the district just beyond the village. It will be a very severe and humiliating lesson to her; she was very proud."

I must confess I was interested, and desired to know more, much more I asked no questions. I could not forget the past.

Not long after this I learned that the Hayne estate, which had passed into the hands of some eastern speculator, was again for sale. I purchased it, having no definite purpose in view, unless it was the thought that it would make a comfortable residence for my father in his declining years, since his own cottage was fast going to decay. I at once set about repairing the large mansion on the Hayne farm, for that too had fell the mouldering touch of time, and for that purpose I frequently drove out to watch and direct the operations of the laborers.

I was one day driving leisurely along when I espied at some distance before me an old man, bent with age and with a tedious staff along the road. Presently he sat down by the roadside to rest, and when I came up I offered him a seat in the buggy.

"Never mind," said he, "it is only a little way that I have to go, just to yonder hill-top. I go there sometimes when the days are pleasant like this, to meet my daughter and accompany her home from school. She is teaching, you know."

I disregarded his refusal of my offer, and sprung out of the carriage, extending my hand to assist him to a seat, as though I thought it was a matter of course that he would ride.

"Well, well, since you wish it, I will go with you. There are not many that are kind to the aged now-a-days. I am not that I was six years ago. I was a rich man then—very rich—but speculation did the mischief. Son yonder house, just beyond the school, it was thought it was a happy home, but it was never be mine again."

And thus he babbled on, for the infirmities of age, prematurely induced by his misfortunes, had rendered him garrulous. He was indeed changed—for among all I had seen since my return home, not one had grown so old as he. He did not recognize me; and as I drove slowly along, very slowly—for he said many things that were interesting to me—I learned more of Isabel—the same affected me, I will confess it, more than I had prefer.

I had often passed the school house, as it was directly on my way to the farm, but had never caught sight of the fair teacher. As we now approached, I observed the scholars rushing from the door of the school room, and before we drove up, she herself emerged and stood before us.

"Ah, Isabel, this kind gentleman urged me to ride in his carriage, and I want you to think him in my behalf, because you don't know how it has rested me."

I had remained unrecognized by the father; I could not escape the penetrating glance of the daughter. Her quickly changing color indicated at once that she knew, or at least suspected, who I was. I turned around my carriage, spring out, and offered to assist her in, saying:

"Permit me, Miss Hayne—your father is fatigued, and I intend drive to your home. I shall have ample time to attend to my other business afterwards."

She stammered some excuse, I insisted upon her riding, and had the satisfaction of seeing her yield.

For a moment I gave myself up to the happy memories of the past, and I was again beside my lady love; I had ever loved. I felt the rustle of her dress against my hand, and notwithstanding my exterior coolness and assumed indifference, I could not suppress the tumult within.

Isabel was a little changed, but changed for the better. The haughty hauteur had become the beautiful Madonna. She was pensive, sad. But little was said during the homeward drive, except that which was uttered by the talkative old gentleman. Isabel said nothing. What a strange meeting. Had I been an entire stranger, as Mr. Hayne supposed me, it could scarcely have been different. She did indeed smile when I lifted her from the buggy, then lisped, "Thank you," then blushed, then paled again. Mr. Hayne cordially invited me to revisit their humble cottage, and solicited the honor of knowing who I was.

"Is it possible?" he exclaimed, "this is our old friend Temple's son! and returned rich, too, they say. God grant you may make good use of your money. But be warned by an old man, and make no rash venture. Here, Isabel, daughter! did you know this gentleman? This is Harry Temple. You surely have not forgotten him.

"I scarcely recognized him," she replied, somewhat confused, as she returned from the cottage, to lead her invalid father into the house. "I hope we shall have the pleasure of seeing you here again, Mr. Temple."

It was the same sweet voice as of old, tempered by charity, humility, and affliction; and softened by the influence of religion and filial affection.

I pondered well the circumstances. Should I yield to the yearning of my heart? Should I again offer my hand, perhaps to be repulsed? Perhaps she would not, a second time, reject my offer. I would be no sacrifice of principle on my part to offer to wed the poor school teacher, although I had determined never to renew my suit with the wealthy heiress. It might have been destiny that decided her to reject my offer, for had she not done so, I never would have left home and friends to wander in foreign climes in pursuit of wealth. I might at this very day have been grovelling in abject poverty—I would have been utterly unable to restore the old man and his daughter to their old homestead as I now fondly hoped to do. Yes, indeed, pride was conquered, and the principle which never had been quite extinguished within me, but against which I had battled with all my might for eight years, at length triumphed.

I visited their cottage repeatedly, and assured myself that the change in Isabel's character, disposition, and manner, was deep and radical. She no longer had high aspirations—her only thought was the comfort of her doating father.

At length I offered my hand again, and this time I had no scruples about urging my suit, since matters occupied quite a different position from that of former years.

I cannot tell you how happy I was when I pressed her to my bosom, and knew that she was to be mine. If I had loved her in her pride, I did not dare to make her my wife, how much more I loved her now in her humility, when I knew that I could protect her, and restore her and her dear old father to their old home again. I was indeed happy when I saw her shed such copious tears of joy. Ah! thought I, this restitution, this happiness for unhappiness, is sweet both to the donor and the recipient.
