ST. FRANCIS NO. 5...Capt. Sorrels...ST. FR. RIVER.

RIVER WEATHER AND BUSINESS.—The river is still rising rapidly at this point, having risen full 15 feet, in all, and was rising last evening at the rate of 12 inches in the twenty-four hours. On Saturday the Ohio river was falling at Nashville. We learn from the Cincinnati Commercial that the Ohio was falling at Pittsburg Friday night, with 7 feet in the channel. At Wheeling, there was 10 feet. At Cincinnati the river was falling fast, with 12 feet over the falls. The Kanawha is falling, with 4½ feet in the channel. The Illinois river is still falling rapidly, with 4 feet water in the channel. The St. Louis Republican of Saturday reported the upper Mississippi falling from St. Paul down, with four feet on the spurs, and 22 inches on the bar at Rock Island. Below Keokuk there was five and a half feet water in the channel. The Missouri river is falling rapidly, with six feet in the channel from Weston to the mouth. When the Red Wing, which arrived yesterday, left Pine Bluff, there had been a rise of four inches in the Arkansas river at Little Rock, and the St. Francis river was stationary. The Red River was down to 2 feet on. There was another considerable fall of rain in this latitude yesterday morning. The recent rains, we are pleased to learn, have been general, and the prospects are now that the increase of that State will at once become navigable again, especially the Arkansas river, which is continued upon our line to Fort Smith. The weather was cool yesterday, indicating a cessation of rain, and clouds were visible thus at sunset. Business was dull at the landing.

ARRIVED AND DEPARTED.—The regular packets that have arrived since Saturday are the St. Francis No. 5, from St. Francis river, the J. M. Hickey, from St. Louis, the Silver Moon, from Cincinnati, the Admiral, from White river, the Red Wing, from the Arkansas river, the Kentucky from Vicksburg, and the Southerner, from Louisville. The St. Francis No. 5 brought 40 bales of cotton for our market, the Admiral 110 bales, and the Red Wing 4 bales. The Hickey, Silver Moon and Southerner went all heavily freighted—the River Moon bringing a heavy consignment of cotton and other articles for the gas company. The Southerner had a large amount of freight and passengers, and departed with a heavy cargo. She goes, Quinnon, for New Orleans, the Hickey, for St. Louis, the A. W. Quirie, for White river, and the Southerner, for Louisville, departed. The Quinnon took about 80 bales of cotton and considerable other freight; the A. W. Quirie departed well manned with passengers, and had a heavy freight. The new Mary T.—Captain Bolivar, passed down Sunday.

INCIDENTS.—The receipts of cotton by river since Saturday aggregated 195 bales, and the shipments about 800 bales, the latter by the Gem, Quitman for New Orleans.....Capt. John T. Shivers has contracted for the purchase of the steamer Republic, for the Memphis and New Orleans trade, the channel of Bayou Bevan regulated to take a large amount of cotton in her.....Deputy Marshal Swan returned from Napoleon yesterday, on board the R. J. Lockett, having taken Mr. Clark, the self-of a man named Absalom Clark, who is proceeding on trial for the Lockport for $14,000 damages. Mr. Clark is the proprietor of a slave boat, which was damaged in a collision with the Lockett, and he brought suit for Clark alleges that it impaired his wife's health in addition to the injury which was due to his boat and stores. Captain Willey, of the Lockett, had not given the required bond of $2,000 and consequently was arrested and detained in custody. In the meantime he raised an attachment to be served against Clark's boat and his stock in trade, in this port, which will be held to satisfy the owners of the Lockett. Meanwhile, Clark has entered a bond of $2,000 and that the prosecution is malicious and unwarranted. The Lockett discharged about 1,000 tons passenger at this port.....The steamer Moses McClelland, Capt. J. R. Archer, will arrive from Memphis on Wednesday morning and return Thursday.....Capt. John D. Adams is commanding the Red Wing in the absence of Capt. Smith, who is experiencing the misfortune of his new boat.....The John Walsh has the N. O. to all last our.....Mr. J. R. Mosely, Jr., has taken the Memphis and Charleston off of Mr. Anderson. We are informed by Messrs. Mosely and Brown for lease.....The Admiral, when last below St. Charles, in White river, finished her cargo of cotton and left for this port with 110 bales, some of the trip on one wheel. She arrived here Sunday morning.....The Emerald passed up yesterday, with the ladies and gentlemen who have been attending the minstrel entertainment at Memphis. The musicians of the party were affected with homesickness at the lungs after the boat left New Orleans, and it was feared he would not survive the trip. As a consequence the boat continued under way throughout, that the patient might enjoy a breath of the sea on smooth water. Some of the passengers wished to quite rail from this city, but they would not make an attachment to get through overland by half-fare, and abandoned the idea.....The new S. T. Adams will leave Louisville for the Memphis and New Orleans packet line. The Adams will be under command of Capt. Triplett, late of the Southerner.....The Mem. Bulletin and Morning Sun on the Evansville were detained near Madison, Ind., Saturday night.....The Messenger, Jacobs, passed up the upper Fulton with 200 tons, and a small lower passenger and freight on board.....The steamer Lake City is running between St. Louis and St. Paul.

The Cincinnati Enquirer gives the following items in regard to the proposed enlargement of the Portland canal: The directors intend to cut an thirty-five feet of earth from one side, making it one hundred feet wide, and to remove the obstructions in the canal at several places, or place the boats to pass each other in make a dam extending from the head of the canal to the mouth of Bayou creek, to detach but share the present locks, extending about a quarter of a mile down the river; to construct two new locks, one hundred feet wide and forty feet long. With such improvements, it will not require more than an hour to pass the largest steamer through the canal, and fifty boats a day after pass without detention. The cost of the work would not exceed $50,000. As the advantages derived by the proposed plan of improvement is that it will not impede the use of the canal during its construction. The proposed branch leaves from the main canal, just above the present locks, and runs in a direct line to the south-east corner of the lock, and thence to the south-east, or the lock below. The work, which is to be removed thirty-five feet from one side, can be removed without interrupting the navigation of the canal. The work must be taken out in order to deepen it, can be taken from the bottom of the present canal, they say, in about ten months, during low water in the river, when there is every little commerce upon it. When completed by this branch, it will afford the advantage of holding a tow of boats on the present canal bound south to pass small boats when the river is in good order, and those on the branch to pass the upper boats.

Boats Leaving To-Day.

NEW ARKANSAS RIVER.—The steamer DR. Draught steamed West Wind, Capt. Jeffries, for the Arkansas River, at 4 o'clock this afternoon. The river is reported to be rising and the boat will go without difficulty, affording an excellent opportunity to passengers and shippers of a safe and speedy trip to Dardanelle river.

FOR VICKSBURG.—The popular steamer Kentucky, Capt. Jas. Lee, in the regular mail packet for Vicksburg, leaves the wharf at 4 o'clock this afternoon. Passengers for will passengers having transported passengers, freight and baggage to and from the Kentucky, and our young friend Quinn is her agent.

FOR THE ST. FRANCIS RIVER.—The fine new steamer St. Francis, Capt. Wm. Sorrels, will leave for Helena and the St. Francis river at a certain early hour to-morrow. She is admirably adapted to the trade, and is especially and additionally commanded by Mr. DeWitt Alford in the clerk.

FOR WHITE RIVER.—The fine steamer Admiral, Capt. Hickey, will leave for all points on White river at 4 o'clock this afternoon. Passengers will find her and Captain Hickey well and good cooks. Capt. Stevenson has charge of the office.

OLD HOUSE IN JUDEN STRASSE.

THE REWARD OF INTEGRITY.

In one of the most distinguished quarters of Frankfort-on-the-Maine was the street called Juden Strasse, or Jew's Street. Although in the very heart of the city, it was quiet and retired, and represented not a small number of the busy residents of Frankfort.

In one of the houses dwelt a Jew, whose love of gain, if, indeed, it could be called a passion, entered into his soul—was under the full dominion of his honesty and integrity. These were jewels which he prized far above the gold and precious stones with which he fondly sought to adorn themselves for their outward poverty of appearance.

It will perhaps, may that he was not entirely seeking for means to provide against the future contingencies of fortune, and to lay up something for the little ones who sat around his board. Be that as it may, he was enthroned a pure principle of honor and justice, perfectly incorruptible, to the loss of which wealth and honors could not bribe, nor poverty compel him.

The wife of Ben Heber Rothschild was a fit companion for such a man. Stately as an ancient princess, and beautiful as only her own race can be, in the warm, rich and brilliant of her deep black eyes and raven hair—distinguished for the peculiar purple tint that flashes over all to the nerve's rays, just as they gleam over the ring-dove's neck—Sarah Rothschild was as good as she was beautiful.

Their house was neat and beautifully ordered. Although the rooms were not of a single form, it was made of square old wood, that would now bring its weight in gold. One chest was occupied in sets of differently patterned Dresden chinaware, the pride of families who had been impoverished, and who were fated to let them lie in the Jew's closet while they lived upon the money they brought. Ah! how few could resist them! this chest was often carefully exposed to strangers, and the wealth of beautiful cups and plates was the theme of many lips, as it was the admiration of the children of Ben Heber. They, indeed, were never tired of gazing upon the paintings and the gilding that enriched the china.

Perhaps, the outer closet was thus fearlessly exposed, few would have imagined that behind its seemingly secure back there was an inner one that contained entirely inheritances in gold and diamonds. This inner back closet, so constructed that the closet inspection would not reveal its existence; and in it were hidden—and that treasure that extraordinary Jew, the outer closet was thus fearlessly exposed, few would have imagined that behind its seemingly secure back there was an inner one that contained entirely inheritances in gold and diamonds. This inner back closet, so constructed that the closet inspection would not reveal its existence; and in it were hidden—and that treasure that extraordinary Jew, the pawnbroker.

As a receiving profit, but simply those which had been entrusted to his integrity to keep, and for which he would never be paid.

One night when the family were abed, a loud tire of feet, a faint knock was heard at the door, and was answered by the master of the house. A gentleman, plain and simple in his dress, and carrying nothing, of such a size, with which to defend himself, appeared on the steps. His person was wholly unknown to the Jew, and it seemed that he was only so to the stranger, for he was particular in asking for him by name.

He inducted his visitor to the room where his wife was still sitting as he had left her in front of the closet, which stood with its wide glass doors quite open. At first the stranger seemed half disposed to object to the presence of the lovely Jewess, but when she turned her superb head, and acknowledged his own presence by a bow, whether grave and serene countenance relaxed into a smile, he seemed content that she should stay and witness his business with her husband. This was soon unfolded. The visitor was a German prince, who, from some political or personal reason, was forced to flee from Frankfort. He had heard of the purity and uprightness of the man with whom he had come to deal, and he wished to place all he had in the world under his charge, if he would accept the trust.

"I wish only," said the prince, "to retain enough for my expenses to a foreign land. Once there, it will go hard if a prince cannot find something on which to exercise his wits sufficient to obtain a living. If nothing offers nearer, I shall shape my course to that land toward the setting sun, where, I am told, the distinctions of rank vanish, and where every man is as good as his neighbor."

The Jew promised, and asked when he would bring the treasures, so that he might be able to appoint a private meeting to arrange their business.

"I have them here," answered the prince, drawing from beneath his vest a wide girdle. On examination it was found to press apart with secrets springs, and in recesses, which were deeply lined with soft wool, was found a collection of the most precious and dazzling stones that ever greeted the eyes of the Jew. Diamonds whose lustre was like a star, rubies and sapphires, each of which was worth a principality, were in turn admired and commented on, and taken an account of. It was past midnight after the examination ended and the accounts finished.

"Now" said the prince, "I would fain see where my treasure is to be, that, in case anything should happen to you and your wife, I might know where to seek it."

"That is a precaution of only common prudence," answered the Jew. "You shall yourself behold it, put in a place of safety, from which it will not be removed until your return, save by circumstances in which even the sacrifice of my life be demanded."

The strangers was satisfied to prevent all prying eyes. The Jew and his wife removed the chins from one side of the closet, and then carefully slipped back a panel, which was so beautifully fitted in that no one ingenuity of the secret could have detected it, the girdle was lowered into a receptical beneath the shelf. In a moment all was replaced. The prince bowed his thanks, shook hands with his new friends, and was soon on the road, flying from pursuit.

Months passed away into years, and the Jew worked early and late. The beautiful Sarah watched the cradle of her children with a mother's tender affection. Her ambition for her sons was not that they should become great, but good men; but she hoped they would become a little more successful in life than their plodding, laborious father.

Then came the terrible French invasion and those revolutions which convulsed all Germany. Frankfort, Hamburg, Bremen, felt the shock, and the poor Jews, hunted, pillaged of their wealth, dishonored and persecuted, were scarcely able to escape with life; while the horrible cry of "down with the Jews!" prevailed over all other sounds, and deafened the ears of the poor Hebrews therewith.

In this time of alarm and confusion, Sarah Rothschild kept a brave woman's heart within her bosom. She did not flinch from sorrow, but grew more gloriously beautiful and stately than ever. A mother and a wife, she lost sight of herself in heroic love for the dear objects of her affection. Her home was ransacked and pillaged—everything of value was taken by the lawless French soldiery, who scornfully reviled her husband for keeping such a miserable place for a Jew to live in.

The persecution did not cease here. Every Jew who put his head out of doors was required to take off his hat to the Christians; and if he omitted this act of humiliation, was stoned and abused. And the proud spirit of Sarah chafed to see her husband and the brave beautiful boys, who shared their sufferings the multitude, receive insults and threatenings from even the children of the Christians.

Years went by. The prince returned. He had seen both trouble and prosperity in his far country which he had known to as a refuge; and now with renewed health and strength, and a brave, strong spirit, that was determined to take life as it came, he came back without murmuring, he settled quietly down near Frankfort. All around him were traces of the fierce struggle which had passed; but as the grass springs up elastic from the foot that treads it down, so does a city or nation recover itself after the oppressor has been trampled out within its borders.

The German prince sometimes thought of the treasure he had committed to the Jew; but he knew what his class was reported to have suffered, and that, in the last climax of extremity, honor, integrity must fall before the absolute necessity that surrounded the unhappy Jews. He, conducted himself, and he felt the high-souled son stately Jew as his husband might have been most essentially benefitted by the deposit he had left them and thus the matter rested in his mind.

One morning while the prince was at breakfast, he was told that a person wished to see him on business. He desired his presence in the breakfast-room, where, to his astonishment, surprised and gratified by the sight of his old friend, the Jew.

"I come," said he, "to speak about the property left with you."

"Don't mind that at all, my friend," interrupted the prince, "he come and take breakfast with me. Nay, I insist and pray, do not mention the affair. I remember that it was I to do you service in a time when you must have needed it much. Sit down, and in this adorable coffee, we will drink away its remembrance altogether."

The Jew took the proffered chair.

"Believe me, prince, your treasure is safe, just as I told you. The chest was searched again and again, and every seam examined without success. The fine old china, and, indeed all our possessions were sacrificed to the principle of honor and justice. Everywhere the integrity of their father was sounded abroad by the prince, who deemed that his thanks and presents alone were not sufficient. The world knew nothing, and the humble Jew received not only the trust but the companionship of princes and nobles. In all parts of the commercial world men heard the name with reverence; and while Jews of other lands are scattered about in the greatest cities of Europe, the monarchs of finance, the arbiters of the money market, the successful, because honorable, controllers of the wealth of nations.

But though frequently urged to make her home one of splendor, yet in the palace in which they dwell, Sarah Rothschild passed her period old age in the quaint old house in the Juden Strasse. When her sons, who were princes in their own right, had left the country's gift of nobility—given, too, to merit alone—when they visited her, she received them in the same room in which they had received their fathers. And as the years passed on, the stately matron rose up with a grace and dignity that would seem to belong only to a queen, and, laying her hands upon their heads, would bless them in the name of Jehovah God.

"May their tribe increase" is the heartfelt thought of all who know their worth and integrity. Such is a true sketch of the great House of Rothschild.
