WHEN I MEAN TO MARRY.

BY J. H. G. SAXE.

When do I mean to marry? Well—
"It's time to choose with I see
But if you choose to hear me tell,
Pray listen while I do the same.

When dancing are the girls with curved feet
And one he's easily taken in,
Come to the ball—I'll which they wear!
And mark the models on which they wear!

When maidens look upon a man
As in home it what they would marry,
And not a many soldiers than
A set or a commissary!

When gentlemen who have got
Go for a week's ha-ha
Come to the conclusion "certainly not,"
And come home his lot of land;

When you are mechanics are allowed
To court and wed the "arm ro" girls,
Which do not expect to be endowed
With robes, diamonds and pearls!

When wives in short, she freely give
Their hearts and hands to all their spouses,
And live as they were built to live,
Within their strict pecuniary means!

Then maybe—I'm not too old—
I'm going to take to my life,
Pitch on an heaver come to hold,
And look about for a wife!

THE UNWASHED OTHELLO.

One night last P. H., Col. C., of G., with one or two others who were supping at Bugle Inn, at Newport, agreed to amuse themselves in this manner: A scene of Othello was fixed upon, Othello, by the colonel, who, in order to look his character, blackened his face all over with burnt cork belonging to one of the empty champagne bottles that stood by the sideboard.

The night was far spent when lady C's coachman, who waited to drive the colonel home, and who had made several attempts to go home away, sent up word that he could not keep his horses out any longer, and if the colonel did not come immediately he must drive direct to S without him. The latter not wishing to compromise an old and valued servant, instantly composed, and dismissing the carriage, walked up to the house, let himself in with a latch key, and went straight to bed, quite forgetting that his face was blackened all over.

In the morning, Mrs. C. awoke, and turning round discovered a black man snoring by her side. Too much frightened to scream, she jumped out of bed and rang the bell furiously, and wrapped herself in the bed curtains.

In rushed the lady's maid and house-keeper.

"O ma'am! what's the matter ma'am?" cries both in a breath.

"Nothing happened to the colonel, I hope ma'am?" said the butler at the door.

"I hope master didn't took with a fit, ma'am?" pursued the footman peering over the butler's shoulder.

"O! take it away! take it away!" cried Mrs. C speaking with great difficulty, and giving herself another twist in the bed curtains.

"What is it, ma'am—what is it?" said the femme de chambre, frightened out of her wits.

"Is it to bed, ma'am?" inquired the house keeper, waddling up to it.

"Saw!" snored the still slumbering Othello.

"Murder!" echoed Mrs. C, applying herself to the bell.

"Don't be alarmed, ma'am," said the butler, bolting in, followed by the footman and groom, armed with what weapons they could lay their hands on, "we'll soon secure the rascal. Lads, mind your heads!" and with this the gallant[illegible] drawed the colonel's sabre, which he had appropriated, and supported by the rest of the party approached the bed.

"Help!" roared the colonel, starting on his head at[illegible], for he had been awakened by the hubbub.

"Murder! help!" vociferated Mrs. C, stamping and pulling down the bell-pull.

"Help! murder!" reiterated the footman, scrambling out of the room on all fours, as if he were acting a staghound in some mythological charade.

"Here, Tom, Dick, come back, you rascals!" cried the bewildered colonel, throwing his nightcap after them. "John, you old fool you go up—Where's your mistress? If you don't get up this instant, and tell me the meaning of all this, and who keeps screaming behind the curtains here, I'll fling the bolster at you, you old villain! Are you all mad?"

"Bless me! is this you, sir?" said the butler, rising.

"I, I my dear! is this you?" cried Mrs. C., peeping.

"Me! to be sure it is! Who the plague should it be? What are you both laughing at? What were you all frightened for? Did you take me for the devil?"

"We did, indeed, sir," said the butler, as soon as he could speak.

"And no wonder!" cried Mrs. C., laughing heartily. "What in the world have you done to your face, my dear?"

"Eh! What's the matter with my face?" inquired the colonel, who had forgotten all about the previous night's theatricals.

"Nay, you best know," rejoined his better half.

"John, bring the colonel the glass."

"Eh! O! I recollect now," said the colonel, looking at himself. "Ha! ha! ha! Ho! ho! ho! Capital! Glorious! No wonder you took me for the devil! Ha! ha! ha! How Harry and the rest of 'em will laugh when they hear this. John, you may go. And when the servant left the room the colonel explained the whole matter.

How Long Shall You Live?

You will live forever. There are no dead. The blow which struck asunder body and spirit, did not end the spirit's life. And so the countless myriads of the past, whose dust have long since mingled with the sod, "still live!" The men, women and children in Noah's days, and Abraham's and David's—the motley tribes that heeded beneath the crescent of the Arabian prophet the swarms of Goth and Hun, Tartar and Vandal, that swept the plains of the Eastern world—the red men that roamed the forests of the Western world, and left in mounds and tree-grown ruins the dim history of their vanished existence—all these are yet alive. They cannot die. Immortality is their birthright and inheritance. With the first breath of life they made immortality.

You, too, are indefinitely eternal. The life you have begun is an endless life. You have only crossed the threshold. The countless ages before you stretch out in immeasurable distance. When you have trod the path of those years or millions of years which you can reckon up, there will still be before you as many more, fresh and new like the first, and so on forever and ever.

As the traveler can discern his pathway winding among the hills a mile far off on the horizon, it seems to end, but when he reaches the place, there's a circle the path again away to the hill top—so will the ages of your endless life be before you ever the same, age following age, cycle following cycle, till all your powers of computation and measurement have been baffled and silenced—and yet you have scarcely begun! The never ending eternity stretches out just as far ahead as when you took the first step of the journey.

How long will you live? You will live forever. And your life then will depend on your life here. Every day as you complete it, will reappear in the years to come. Every hour, every moment, as it burns on its way, leaves a page to be read before the throne. Every word, every act, every thought and feeling of your heart, is made itself imperishably in the memory of One who never forgets. You are writing your life eternally.

Albert Pike, of Arkansas.

Albert Pike, one of the newly appointed brigadier generals in the Confederate service, is one of the most notable characters of his day. A distinguished writer of the Augustan age, remarks that nature is not so prodigal of her bounties as to confer, in any considerable degree, the qualities of different character in the same person; that it is against her laws to confer eminence on an individual except in a single character or pursuit. The rule here laid down is undeniably one to which the history of the world furnishes but few exceptions. But few have ever lived in the "Tide of Time" who were great as statesmen and warriors, or poets and politicians, or speakers and writers. He only does, indeed, furnish a few illustrious examples quite familiar to the intelligent reader. The people of our own country are somewhat noted for the number of pursuits in which they engage. Finding the field of enterprise open to all who choose to enter it, many of them seek fame and fortune through as many different pursuits, and in as many different characters as they may think most favorable to the attainment of the end they have in view. It must be confessed, however, that but few of them have acquired eminence, and no [illegible] of them exceed in more than one character.

[illegible] numerous public men now active in the Confederate States, we must allow to the gentleman whose name heads this article, the palm of versatility of talent. Albert Pike is an elder among and forcible speaker, as thousands of men who have heard him in State conventions and in popular assemblies will testify. He is a good writer, as all will admit who are familiar with his contributions to the political and literary journals of the Southern [illegible]. He is a very respectable poet, as the critics of the North and the South have long since decided. He is an editor in good standing, as his brethren of the quill, and the readers of the several journals with which he has been connected, will testify. He is a lawyer of decided ability, as we are told, and as his success in the high courts would seem very clearly to indicate. He possesses ability and judgment in financial matters, as is shown by his success as a man of business. His claim to the title of a northern born man with genuine southern courage was earned and earnestly [illegible] officer on the terrible battle field of Buena Vista.

[illegible] a northern born man with southern principles, is doubted by no one who is familiar with his course through his long southern residence. By pen, tongue and purse he has contributed liberally to the cause of southern independence. His appointment to a brigadier generalship by the Confederate government, is, no doubt, a good one. The Indian volunteers constitute a portion of his forces, as we have seen it stated. They have the utmost confidence in Albert Pike, and under his lead will go forth to battle and to victory against the invaders of their section.—Richmond Examiner.

THE CENSUS OF ENGLAND.

On the 8th of April last, the decennial census of Great Britain was taken; 31,000 census takers were employed, and the whole work was performed in one day. The returns for England are already published. They show a considerable increase in population, and yet since 1811 the rate of increase has been steadily decreasing. At this rate, in a hundred years more the population of England will become stationary at about the figure of forty millions of people. The following table shows the actual increase since 1811, and the decennial rate of increase per cent:

Year.	Population.	Increase.	Per cent.
1811	10,454,529	—	—
1821	12,172,344	1,718,135	16
1831	14,091,866	1,879,522	15
1841	16,683,581	2,593,215	14
1851	18,604,470	2,918,871	13
1861	20,523,406	1,159,936	12

This falling off in the rate of increase is not to be attributed to increased death-rates, for it is certain that the average duration of life in the chief districts of both town and country has, through sanitary improvements, been considerably increased.

The population of the city of London, on the contrary, shows a very large increase; indeed, the increase for the last ten years has been no less than 440,798, or about 19 per cent, on the population in 1851. It is not a little singular to note that the tendency in the Eastern States of this country as well as in England, is to mass the population in the cities. London, which had but one-eighth of the population in England in 1851, has more than one fifth of the increase for the last ten years, and now contains considerably more than one seventh of the population of the kingdom. The actual increase of the population of this, the largest city in the world, is so remarkable that we give it in detail:

Year.	Population.	Increase.	Per cent.
1801	958,863	—	—
1811	1,128,915	170,052	19
1821	1,378,947	249,132	20
1831	1,654,994	276,047	20
1841	1,954,417	299,423	9
1851	2,362,236	277,819	19
1861	2,803,034	440,798	19

Of the thirty-seven metropolitan districts in which London is divided, ten have actually decreased in population, the decrease in the city of London being no less than 10,382 inhabitants. In the most of the other central districts the population has increased but very slightly; the increase is mainly in the suburbs. The population of London, like that of Philadelphia, does not pile up in masses; it spreads out over the country. This is specially shown by the number of inhabited houses, which has increased almost in the precise ratio of the increase of population:

Year.	Population.	Inhabited houses.	Persons to a house.
1851	2,362,236	339,933	6 — 270,705
			7 — 305,993
1861	2,803,034	362,870	7 — 362,844
			7 — 362,890

In fact, the number of houses has increased rather more rapidly than the population. While the average number of persons to a house throughout England and Wales is 5.4, in London it is no more than 7.4. In New York, on the contrary, the number of persons to a house is two or three times the average throughout the country.—New York Tribune.

Decay of Race.

In the last report issued by the British colonial office, on the past and present state of British colonial possessions, an account is given of the fifteen persons, all adults, aborigines of Tasmania, who are the sole surviving remnant of ten tribes. Nine of these persons are women and five are men. There are among them four married couples, and four of the women and five of the men are under forty five years of age, but no children have been born to them for years. It is considered difficult to account for this. The Maoris of New Zealand are said to attribute their decline in number to the general change of habits introduced by civilization. Besides these fourteen persons, there is a native woman who is married to a white man, and who has a son, a fine healthy looking child, of whom she and all the blacks are very proud. These fourteen aboriginal natives of Van Dieman's Land live at Oyster Cove Station, where they are fed, clothed and housed at the public expense; their subsistence and management cost above £700 a year.

Their principal employment is cooking their food, mending and making their clothes and getting their wood, for which they have to go a considerable distance; but all work devolves upon the women—the men do nothing. They are much addicted to drinking, have an antipathy to the Christians, and insist on keeping a number of dogs, which live, eat and sleep with their owners. Their chief amusements are fishing and hunting; in the latter they generally amount themselves once or twice during the season for two or three weeks, or a month, living during that time in the bush. They always set leave to go upon these occasions, and take with them their bedding, pots and pans, etc., and as many rations as they can carry. Their behavior is very good when they are not excited by strong drink. The men generally speak English, but in quarrel they invariably use their original language. Their health is in general very good.

A Grand Duchess in 1741.—In the "Memoirs of Mary Granville" (Mrs. Delaney), just published by Lady Llanover, is a letter describing a ball given by Frederick, Prince of Wales, in 1741. The following is the account of the appearance of one of the "finest of the ladies:" "The Duchess of Queensbury's clothes pleased me best; they were white satin embroidered, the bottom of the petticoat brown hills covered with all sorts of weeds, and every breadth had an old stump of a tree that ran up almost to the top of the petticoat, broken and ragged and worked with brown chenille, round which twined nasturtiums, ivy, honeysuckles, periwinkles, convolvuluses, and all sorts of twining flowers, which spread and covered the petticoat; vines with the leaves variegated as you have seen them by the sun, air rather smaller than nature, which made them look very rich; the foliage and facings were little green beaus, with all sorts of weeds, and the sleeves and the point of the gown bouse too twining branches of the same as the one on the petticoat; many of the leaves were finished with gold, and part of the stumps of the trees looked like the gilding of the sun. I never saw a piece of work so prettily fancied."

Battey's Springs,

NEAR FLORENCE ALABAMA.

THIS most celebrated Watering Place is now open for the reception of visitors, and has already a goodly number present from different parts of the country. We have engaged the services of the celebrated BOHLEN BAND for the season, who are hard to report on brass or string instruments. The advantages of Battey's are all stated by all who have visited this place to excel those of any other watering place. Stages run from the Springs only a quarter of a mile, and Tennessee river only four miles distant, and we are supplied with Bohlen boats or ferry for the purpose. Our Ten-pin Alleys and Billiard Tables are up and in order.

The waters of these Springs are recommended by more than two hundred of the most eminent physicians in the surrounding country, for the cure of nervous [illegible], dyspepsia, liver complaint, diseases peculiar to females, sore eyes, chronic diarrhea, syphilis, and all diseases of the kidneys, urinary organs, and all enfeebled diseases. Numbers of the most remarkable cures have been testified to by most respectable living witnesses.

Col. James Manson, late of Duke Springs, assists in the management of the house, and no pains will be spared to make our guests in every way comfortable. Our table shall be supplied with the best the country affords, and our accommodations in every respect shall be as good as those of any other watering place in the country.

Our stage coaches will be at the depot at Florence on the arrival of the cars, at all times, and convey all passengers to and from the Springs without delay.

Our livery stable is well stocked with carriages, buggies and horses, for pleasure riding.
