The Trade Unionist and His Politics

(BY EUG UNSWORTH)

A democracy has been defined as the government of the whole people by the whole people equally represented, and although it is frequently asserted that we are the most democratic nation in the world, the decadence of our modern political system under the influence of combination of capital justifies us in asserting that we are very far from approaching our democratic ideal.

It must be apparent to the intelligence of the most optimistically inclined defender of the present political situation that corporate wealth is fast gaining the upper hand of the people and slowly but surely converting this country from democracy to plutocracy—from a nation governed by the whole people to a nation governed by a few mercenary individuals.

The man with the muck rake is telling the story of labor's betrayal by its representatives in governmental affairs, and the political and social unrest which is spreading to every city in the United States indicates that the people are cognizant of the dangers that confront them, and are preparing to retire to private life those individuals whose political careers, if not checked, will eventually convert this republic into a privately owned institution.

The issues before the country today are largely economic. We have before us two contending forces, each struggling for supremacy—the despotism of capital and the organization of labor; the first advocating the abject servitude of the masses, the second freedom of thought, will and action along lines that tend to the political and economic freedom of all the people. Society depends upon its sound and healthy growth on the freedom with which its individual members co-operate. Under our present complex industrial system an individual without the assistance of his fellow man can accomplish but very little. The private ownership and monopoly render co-operation impossible. It can, then, be readily observed that our large combinations of capital which control our government are a menace and a barrier to the full, free and proper development of our social organism. It must be apparent to the most superficial observer that the majority of our men in public life who constitute the lawmakers of this nation are not only incompetent to grasp the gigantic industrial problems of the period, but have proven themselves to be the plain tools of our privately owned monopolies. The removal of these men from public office is a duty devolving upon the wage earners of this country, and there is therefore no question of greater importance to the masses than the one which relates to the proper disposition of their ballot, for upon its wise and judicious use depends the satisfactory solution of our intricate social problem and the perpetuation of our republican form of government.

The remarkable growth of the trade union movement has been the wonder of this and the preceding century, and its success in ameliorating the conditions of the masses has been conceded by the student and observer of social affairs. To check its growth and annihilate it, to render it inoperative, has been the ardent dream of a certain section of the employing class whose hypocritical cant about the personal liberty of the toiler consists in the wage earner humbly accepting a job at the conditions the employer sees fit to indicate, who allows the employer to dictate his wages, hours and other conditions of employment, and who is satisfied to permit the employer to claim himself every privilege denied the employee.

To accomplish these purposes certain employers have brought to their assistance the powers of the government, have corrupted judges and have supported powerful lobbies in almost every seat of government in this country. It is therefore the duty of every trade unionist to interest himself in the politics of his locality, to ascertain the character of the men who are destined to make the laws that will guide the destinies of our people and to cast his vote only for those individuals who promise to support those reforms which are necessary to further the free development of organized labor along the lines of justice and fair dealing, and not in the special interest of a certain money class.

The cry of the "open shop," which literally translated signifies long hours of labor, small wages and every evil that trade unionism has been successful in eradicating, is being propagated to deceive the public and gain sympathy for certain forms of employers' associations, and under this pretext every reform law introduced by labor is subject to defeat if it does not suit the will of the employing class who oppose it. Our representatives, wearing the hall mark of predatory capital, basely betray the interests of the masses, and with each succeeding year we preserve the defeat of the eight-hour bill, anti-injunction measure and sundry petitions demanded by labor. The United States is far behind every country in the world as regards labor legislation. Practically very little is accomplished in this direction, the defeat of labor legislation has become a general practice, while hundreds of worthless bills are passed at the meetings of every legislature in the country. At the recent meeting of the New York legislature no fewer than forty bills in the interest of labor suffered defeat, while eight bills secured the governor's signature and became a law. Such a total ignoring of the people's rights could not exist if we had representative men from our own ranks to plead labor's cause, and the sooner the trade unionist realizes the necessity of political action along trade union lines, the sooner will he lessen the burden on labor's shoulders. England has now fifty representative labor champions from the ranks of the working classes in parliament, and Germany has eighty, while in the United States we can scarcely boast of a single labor representative in congress.

The workmen of this country should therefore concentrate every effort towards organization along political lines, which movement will undoubtedly terminate in the improvement of the condition of the masses, lessen the number of strikes, lockouts and other evidences of economic discontent, permit the workers to participate in the blessings of material advancement and establish that democracy which is something more than a mere shadow of the substance.

CALHOUN'S DESCENDANT

A New York Belle a Great Granddaughter of Two Vice Presidents.

Although not the daughter of a hundred earls, Miss Julia Calhoun, who is a guest of Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Hearne, is the great-granddaughter of two vice presidents of the United States, John C. Calhoun and Richard M. Johnson, says the Denver Times.

In point of blue blood, Miss Calhoun is probably the most distinguished visitor who has graced Denver society for many moons. She is modest and retiring and adroitly turns conversation away from the discussion of her illustrious ancestors. Over the teacups the matter has been thoroughly discussed and historical records consulted until every one is satisfied that John C. Calhoun was the seventh vice president of the United States when John Quincy Adams occupied the presidential chair. He was one of the trivariate of statesmen—Clay, Webster and Calhoun—who guarded the nation when it was yet in swaddling clothes. Calhoun served several terms in congress and the senate and his name is enrolled upon the nation's annals of fame.

Richard M. Johnson, Miss Calhoun's maternal grandfather, occupied the position of vice president when Martin Van Buren was the nation's chief executive. Kentucky was his native state and he was nominated in 1837. Richard Johnson was a fighter as well as a statesman, and it was his boast that he had made a good Indian of the famous Indian chief Tecumseh by killing him.

A relic which the descendants of Johnson display with great pride is a gold sword presented to him by congress "for deeds of valor and service to the state" and so inscribed.

General John Calhoun of New York, Miss Calhoun's father, is a prominent attorney in the Empire state, but has retired from active work in his profession and is living quietly with his family at West End avenue near Nineteenth street. Miss Calhoun is his only daughter, but there are three sons who bear the honored name of Calhoun.

Why Parisian Women Are Graceful. The graceful figures of Parisian women are said to be due mainly to diet and exercise. The French girl drinks a great deal of milk until about the age of 20, after which her repasts are of a light, non-fattening kind. Where in other countries a woman would take a heavy meal, the Parisienne contented herself with a bowl of soup. Her outdoor exercise is mainly limited to shopping excursions or short strolls in the city. She is very active about her household tasks, both from motives of economy and also as a means of keeping down superfluous flesh.

SECRETS IN PEANUTS KNOWN TO VENDORS

Some peanuts that are bought ready roasted are of a light yellow color. Others, however, are pronounced brunnets. There is a reason for this. The great American peanut will remain crisp only a day or two after roasting and in damp weather only a few hours. It absorbs moisture rapidly, so that two days after roasting the finest nuts lose their crispness and are to all intents and purposes as though they had never been cooked. The Italian and Greek peanut men freshen up their stocks by roasting again and re-roasting. When the press has been repeated three or four times, though, the peanut begins to take on a tawny hue, which is considered objectionable by those who have stands in the better parts of town. These much roasted goobers are therefore sold at a discount to Greeks and Italians who have stands near railroad stations and the cheaper resorts, who can roast, re-roast and re-roast them indefinitely until they are finally sold.

NEEDED IT.

Edward B. Russ, who is to engross the treaty of Portsmouth, is a nature student.

Like many other nature students, Mr. Russ thinks that Roberts, Seton and the new nature students attribute overmuch intelligence to animals. He said, with a laugh the other day:

"At the rate we are now going on it won't be long before we shall be hearing such animal stories as this:

"An old man, on a lonely road among the mountains, was attacked by an eagle.

The old man defended himself bravely. The bird scratched him with its claws and beat him with its wings. He struck it and kicked it and swore at it.

"Finally, worn out, the eagle withdrew. But it did not go empty handed. The old man wore a wig. This wig the eagle snatched off and carried away."

"Surely a remarkably sagacious action on the part of the bird, which was you will please note, a bald eagle."
