MEMPHIS APPEAL.

RESIGNED.

When my weary spinning wheel has done,
And the shades of eve grow deep,
And by the bright beechstone
The old folk sit asleep:
My heart and I in secret talk, when none
Shall see us weep,

Offshore the driving rain,
And sometimes the silent snow,
Blest as the wind-tossed pine
Which sings and sighs and sighs, the smiles and tears,
Of a life long ago!

Till they act the tales they tell,
And a step is on the floor,
And a voice I once loved well
Says, "Open me the door."
Then I start with a chill from the mocking wind, which whispers "Nevermore!"

To the little whitewashed room
In which my days are spent,
And hurry forward the tomb,
My companions gray and bent,
Who truly count their grandchild's life not joyless, but content.

A.'s not for the sons not set,
For the years not yet begun,
For days not numbered yet,
And the work that must be done,
Before the path is crossed, and the weary web is spun!

Like a beacon in the night,
I see my first gray hair!
And I scarce can tell aright
If it is from age or care,
Yet I smile glad at sight of my life, and leaves no landmark there.

But perchance 'tis for the best,
And I must harder strive,
If life is life blessed,
Then not for me to live,
Forbidding a heart hath sought to take, it may have much to give.

And they are old and poor,
And bread is hard to win,
And a grave is at the door
Who soon must enter in;
And to keep its shadow from the hearth, I only toil and spin.

My sorrow is their gain,
And I snow not by a tear
How my multiple pain
Have bought their comfort dear.
For the storm which wrecked my life's best hope has left me stranded here.

But I hear the neighbors say
That the hour-glass runs not fast,
And I know that in that gray day,
When toil and sorrow are past,
The false and true shall receive their due, and I rarely cease aching at last.

—Chamber's Journal.

THE PACHA'S DAUGHTER AND HER AMUSEMENTS.

"Some persons," said Madame Andouard in her preface, "affirm that the torch of civilization has been kindled in Egypt; that the country is making rapid progress while the other provinces of Turkey remain stationary. It is affirmed that the present Viceroy, educated in Paris devotes himself to eradicating whatever of barbarism lingers in the country, and that he has replaced the caprices of despotism by a wise and enlightened liberty!! Fifteen months of inquiry on the spot have led Madame Andouard to a different conclusion. The present volume embodies the data on which her conclusions rests, and illustrates it by a profusion of examples. Some of the stories of Mohammed Ali's family are worthy of the grimmest personages in the "thousand and one Nights," and about as valuable in an historical point of view. The Pacha's daughter, the Princess Nesle Hanen, was a second Marguerite de Bargogne. She was married to a Turkish commissioner, a master of cruelty.

One day Mohammed Ali hinted to his daughter that he never felt quite at ease with her husband. That evening the Boy's coffee was presented to him by the princess, his wife. Coffee does not always agree with the relatives of Eastern potentates; and Nesle Hanen sought to solace her widowhood by a systematic course of intrigues. Her emissaries frequented the cafes. When a candidate for introduction had been found, he was desired to present himself at a certain gate of the palace at a certain hour. There he was received by an eunuch of the harem; his eyes were bandaged and he was conducted to the presence. For a week, Nasle-Hanen was the most amiable hostess. On the eighth day, "My husband is coming home," she would say; "we must part; but when he is again absent I shall take care that you return." The visitor's eyes were again bandaged. When the princess was residing at her palace on the Nile he was conducted to a door opening on the river, and sped forward with a gentle push. At another of the royal seats the Khalig canal took the place of the Nile. At the palace in the Mosker the same useful office was performed by a cistern.

The frequent disappearance at last began to be talked of, and a young Italian determined to break the spell. He went assiduously to the cafe where the ominous invitations were known to be dispensed. One evening a eunuch of the harem seated himself near the young stranger and began to smoke. "I know a fair young lady who is not indifferent to you," he began, "and if you wish I can manage the introduction." "I shall be delighted, if she is so good looking," replied the Italian; "only I can't come this evening. Will you take me to-morrow?" "Yes, be at the door about seven o'clock, and when I pass follow without speaking."

Next day the young man kept his appointment. He had not long to wait and when he had followed his guide into a lonely street, he submitted to his eyes being bandaged. After a long walk they entered a house and ascended a staircase. The bandage was removed from his eyes to a brilliantly lighted room, richly furnished in the Eastern style. A lady, neither young nor beautiful, but admirably dressed, reclined on a divan, playing with a chaplet of coral and diamonds; a slave fanned her with a bunch of ostrich feathers. The Italian received a sign to approach and seat himself on a cushion at her feet. The lady's conversation was enchanting, and with a hostess who did the honors so gracefully a week passed away. At the end of that time, "We must part my beloved," she said; "my husband is about to return; we should be lost." "Madame," replied her guest, "I trust that your husband has no intention of returning, inasmuch as you are the Princess Nasle Hanen, and I have been a widow for some years." The lady made a slight negative gesture.

"Believe me, madam," he continued, "I know who you are, and I know also the fate that awaited me if I had not taken my precautions. Your domestics would conduct me to a small dear opening on the Nile, and assist me with a gentle push." "And pray, monsieur, what precautions have you taken?" "Mon Dieu! madame, they are simple. Instead of following your emissary at once I arranged to cease the next. Meanwhile I had an interview with my consul. When your retainer came to seek me, two steps from us was a person from the consulate. He followed us; he therefore knows that I have been. My consul is accordingly forewarned. If to-day he does not see me again, he will know that I have suffered the doom of your lovers. He will address himself to his Highness the Viceroy. You perceive the scandal that must ensue. Rumor suspects you of numerous crimes. Suspicion will then give place to certainty." The Princess was thunderstruck. Recovering a little she implored him to be discreet. The Italian took his leave, and arrived without accident in the street, where he found a caik from the consulate awaiting him, and already uneasy. It is needless to say that he scrupulously disregarded the parting request of his amiable hostess.

QUEEN VICTORIA AND THE ROYAL PORTIONS.

It is stated that there is to be a new ceremonial in the opening of Parliament. The Queen, instead of using a "state carriage," will occupy what is called a "three carriage," and the robes of state lined and of being worn by the Queen, will be laid upon the throne. The speech itself, instead of being read by the Queen, will be read by the Lord Chancellor.

Flanery, in the London Star, says "If popular gossip may be believed, the principal incentive to Her Majesty's consenting to discharge her duty, is her desire to propitiate public opinion in order that the grant for Prince Alfred's maintenance, which it is intended to propose, may be more readily passed by the Commons. There will be no cavilling at the bestowal of a proper income on the young Prince, who is generally believed to have more brains than most of his family, and to be a clever, if somewhat of a saturnine young man. It is also generally stated that he has been "kept short," and he is humorously said to have filched away what little money he had to subscribe to memorials of his father, the Prince Consort. A proper income for the second son of the sovereign will be voted without hesitation. It is said that an appeal will be made to Parliament to grant an annual allowance to the Princess Helena, now semi officially announced to be engaged to Prince Christian of Augustenburg, younger brother of the gentleman who laid claim to Schleswig Holstein. This is a very different matter. Says the Spectator: As the Queen, who, it must be remembered, accepted Mr. Anvill's bequest of more than a quarter of a million, must now be immensely rich, and can endow such children as need it with princely fortunes, there seems no reason why the nation should demur to an alliance which can scarcely be acceptable to all members of the royal house.

☞ Maximilian having selected one of the descendants of the Emperor Iturbide as his heir, in case he shall have no children of his own, the living members of the Iturbide family become objects of public interest. The Emperor Iturbide left five sons and four daughters, and of the sons the eldest is living, but not married; the second, Angel, married a Mexican lady, and has a son between two and three years old; the third, Salvador, died June seventh, eighteen hundred and fifty-six, leaving a son, who is now being educated in a college at Paris; the fourth, Phillip, died November nineteenth, eighteen hundred and forty-three, leaving children; and the fifth, Augustus, is now living in Paris. It is the son of Salvador, the young student at St. Barbe College, in Paris, who is the chosen heir of Maximilian. The subject would be important as well as interesting, if Maximilian was a little more certain of preserving the throne for which he is choosing a successor.
