Mrs. Wilson's Advice for Coming Year

Discard Worn-Out Utensils, Follow a Weekly Schedule and Plan to Save Small Amount Regularly

NOW, at the close of the dying year, the housewife should sit down, and with notebook and pencil outline her policies for the coming year. Take stock of your household equipment, and the amount of repairs and replenishment that will be required in the home for the coming year, and then plan to distribute this over a series of months, so that no great outlay will be necessary to keep the home up to its required efficiency.

The kitchen, more than any other part of the house, should be given close personal attention, discarding at once all worn-out, useless utensils and planning to use those in stock.

The food chopper should be looked after, and if the parts are worn or lost should be replaced at once; the colander and sieves next should receive attention, then the grater, the mixing bowls and knives. If you are using chipped or cracked mixing bowls, you cannot possibly realize the danger, else you would have discarded them at once.

Monday—Put the house in order, sort clothing for laundry, do repairing. This can best be done on this day, owing to the fact that left-over food can be utilized in the menus on Monday. Soak clothing for laundry.

Tuesday—An early start on this day is necessary if you are to get your clothes out to dry early. The modern housewife, who has the modern utensils, can turn out a fair-size wash with but little extra trouble.

Wednesday—Ironing and putting away the clothing, cleaning the kitchen. This, of course, will depend upon how much laundry and ironing.

Thursday—Straightening up the house and rest of day free.

Friday—Cleaning day; also, in some communities, marketing in the afternoon or early evening.

Saturday—Marketing and baking and putting the final touches to last-minute preparations for Sunday.

The exact time required for the detailed work will depend greatly upon the size of the family, and also if help be brought in on special days. Where there are children in the family, it is well for the children to be responsible for certain duties. A lad from eight years to fifteen years can dust, pare potatoes, prepare vegetables, market for staple articles, wash dishes, clean windows, clean cellars, put out the ashes, keep the newspapers in neat bundles and tied with the waste string, and where there are no little daughters, the laddie can set the table, help with the dishes and many other little tasks. These tasks can be so planned that they will require but an hour a day, and if the mother insists upon this it will be better for both the boy and herself.

Plan to have one night in the week for a real family night. This evening can be so arranged if there are small children that it will not interfere with their schooling. Let them invite a playmate or friend to dinner and expect them to do their part toward helping to make the evening a real success.

A pound of flour, will make thirty biscuits in a large pan of sticky cinnamon bun or ginger bread or a big batch of cookies, and if the cost be roughly estimated as follows you can quickly decide the question, it is a real economy to make these things for the family.

One pound of flour, five cents.
Salt, baking powder and flavor, five cents.
Shortening and sugar, ten cents.
Water for liquid.
Raisins or molasses, five cents.
A grand total of twenty-five cents for two pounds of gingerbread, cookies or sticky cinnamon buns.

Adventures With a Purse

"I'M glad that's over." I've been hearing people say ever since Christmas Day, happy to be relieved of the necessity of choosing presents. It is a problem, I know, but some of us know some one with a birthday in January and that complicates matters. There is one advantage, though, because nearly everything in the stores is reduced and there can be had some really remarkable values. Dorothy's birthday is coming soon and I found a handsome nightie with a lot of embroidery on the front and bows of pink ribbon, reduced to $2.75. There are several patterns in the store and all so pretty and dainty.

Yesterday I was wandering about town, turned into one of those queer, winding streets which are becoming so popular, and found a new little shop. One simply can't keep track of them all; they are like the proverbial mushrooms, springing up over night. And each new shop is fascinating and filled with things one would like to buy. This shop has some powder boxes to carry in a handbag which have the advantage of being just a little different. They are hand painted in old rose, a very pale lavender and a soft gray. On the lid of the boy gnocchi silhouettes dance along. It has powder and a downy, all-topped puff and is only $1.

For names of shops address Woman's Page Editor, or phone Walnut 3000 or Main 1601 between the hours of 9 and 5.

Things You'll Love to Make

Children Love Animal Coat Hangers

The kiddies will love to put away their wraps if they have animal coat hangers on which to hang them. Cover small hangers with some furry material like that of which teddy bears are made. Cut it after the pattern indicated by the black diagram above. Half of one side is shown. You will need two full pieces. Place the two pieces over the hanger. Overcast or buttonhole the edges together, leaving a small open space through which to put some cotton stuffing. Fill the head until it is well rounded. Pad the arms of the hanger fairly well. Tie a ribbon and bell around the neck of the cat. Other animals can be worked out in the same way. FLORA.

The Daily Novelette

Preparedness Paid

By Corona Remington.

"I AM absolutely convinced that there was a later will made, and if I could find it I feel certain my client would be better off by a good many thousand dollars."

"And if you could prove somehow that there was another will, and then find it or make the person holding it give it up, you'd make a whole lot more money, wouldn't you, George?"

"You mercenary little girl," laughed Caruthers. "But you're right. I, or rather we, would make a good bit more."

"It makes me feel all thrilly when you say 'we' like that," she told him.

"It is we. The fact that we aren't quite married yet, Eloise, doesn't make any difference. We will be soon, and we will be sooner if I find old Thomas left another will."

"Who would be apt to have if it he did?"

"I'm chiefly afraid it's been destroyed, but if it ever really existed and if it has not been destroyed Bill Thomas, my client's brother, probably has it. You see, it's this way: Five years ago old Thomas and his son Jim, my client, had a frightful row about a girl Jim wanted to marry and swore he would marry. The father first threatened to cut him off and even to kill him if he had anything more to do with her. But it made no difference; the young chap turned a deaf ear to his father's threats, and not only went everywhere with her openly but married her a few months later. When he heard it, Thomas flew into a violent rage and had a slight stroke as a result of his outburst. That sobered him somewhat and no one heard any more about his wanting to kill Jim, but that very night, fearing he might die, he made a will cutting Jim off entirely and leaving everything to Bill. Since then, however, time seems to have softened his attitude, and he not only grew very fond of Jim's wife but lived in his house the last two years of his life, and the day he died he tried to say something to Jim about a will, but he was so weak he could not make himself understood. Now since he had become reconciled, even attached, to the young wife, it seems natural that he would want to remember her in his will, that is through Jim, of course, and he believes, and I do, too, that Bill knows something about another will. But as it is naturally against his interest to give it away, he's keeping it pretty close. Bill was always a good bit of a black sheep, although no one could convince his father that he could do wrong. It was impossible—Bill was Bill, therefore it was all right whatever he did."

"What do you think about it? Do you think he's honest?"

"Somehow there's something about him I don't like. Good gracious, here it is after 6 o'clock and I've been keeping you here all this time. Won't you let me walk home with you? I haven't my car, but I think it would be fun to walk. We could talk on the way."

They locked the office and went out into the street. Daylight was nearly gone and the street lamps blinked weakly out at them through the half light.

"See, that's Bill Thomas's office up there," said Caruthers stopping in front of a tall building. "See that light on the sixth floor? Wonder what he's doing there? It's way after office hours."

"Do you know him, and does he know his brother has engaged a lawyer?"

"Yes, I've met him, but of course we're working in the dark. If our suspicions are correct and he got onto the fact that we're trying to catch him, he'd be sure to destroy the will, providing it exists.

A moment later they landed on the sixth floor of the Burton Banks building and hurried into Thomas's outer office. Caruthers walked to the door marked "Private" and rapped.

"Come in," a voice said from inside.

Thomas sat at his desk reading some papers.

"You didn't empty my waste paper baskets this morning, Norah," he said without looking up.

"Oh," he gasped a second later. "I thought you were the janitor."

In a flash Eloise stood petrified as she saw her fiance pointing a revolver at Thomas's head.

"As chief city detective I demand that you give me that will of the late Ebenezer Thomas that you were reading when we came in."

Caruthers turned the lapel of his coat and showed his button, and Thomas, seeing that he was trapped, handed over the papers without a word.

That evening as the two lovers sat in front of the fire and read the will Eloise was lost in admiration.

"You're simply wonderful, George, dear," she declared over and over again. "And to think that your client will get over $150,000! But I didn't know that you were connected with the city police."

"Neither did I," laughed George "Those pins cost fifty cents apiece—any one can buy 'em. And they're very impressive sometimes. That revolver wasn't loaded, either."

"You wonderful fraud! Your bark is certainly worse than your bite," laughed Eloise.

"But effective, you'll admit.

"Very," declared the girl warmly, her eyes glistening with admiration.
