KEEP YOUR HEADS.

The constantly increasing gold discoveries now going on in Utah are another evidence of the truth of the claim that this State is the greatest undeveloped part of the country in its mineral resources. There are precious metals everywhere, from the sandstone to the ordinary clay. The latest cause of excitement is the way of finding gold in the mines from Utah county, where it is said the people are practically will over discoveries in the east side of the hills that skirt the southwestern borders of Utah Lake.

There is every reason to believe that in the district related to there are some rich mineral deposits. Perhaps there will be uncovered a vast amount of wealth, and perhaps somebody will get rich from the case to be taken from those hills. We find so much with people going to Utah, making fortunes, and getting whatever profit they can legitimately. We would like to suggest, however, that the mere of a return to overdoing the thing. It was who know nothing of mining rush from their employment, neglecting the latter and sinking the means which their families should have, there is a strong probability that many of them will be greatly disappointed. The shoemaker should stick to his last and the farmer to his farm, at least to the extent that they will retain those interests unimpaired until there is something better clearly in sight. A good mining claim is often a profitable investment; a prospect hole in the ground is often a waste of funds. The amounts of excitement in Utah county may be considerably exaggerated; at any rate we hope there will be few people in that part who, while they may take hold of the advantages offered in the new gold field, yet will not keep their balance free from the craze that sometimes is developed under such conditions as those reported.

THE FRENCH DISPUTE.

The United States has had its tilt with England over the Venezuelan matter and with Spain over Cuba, and now it has been talking right out to France on the subject of that country's discrimination against the American cattle business. The administration's communications on this subject were of a nature that even Frenchmen, who are accustomed to considerable vivacity of expression, thought them "a little fiery." In them it was announced that if France did not cease the discrimination complained of, regulations against French commerce would be enforced, and retaliation be made which would affect the condition now complained of, yet which could not be regarded as a casus belli.

It is to commercial matters that unfriendly relations with the United States would most affect the nations of western Europe; and if retaliation should be resorted to upon France or any similarly situated nation, by the United States, such action would suffer the greater loss. Of individual nations this country is the chief market of the world in international commerce; the European powers have far more interest at stake in getting into American markets than this country has in getting into theirs, because the importation policy of the United States is vastly broader than that of the others. Hence it would be far more important to France than to this country to have unrestricted commercial relations, and but little delay may be anticipated in reaching a settlement, as soon as the Frenchmen arrive at the conclusion that the American is "no dead cartoon."

If the series of international tilts keeps on a little while longer, the European powers will learn the condition that there is something inside themselves to commit to international trade and other matters. Meanwhile Uncle Sam has been generally ignored, and where he has had little to say because his interests have not been touched with very much, yet the residents of various countries are becoming so closely connected that one can hardly move now without touching a person, thing or interest to the side of the water. We can anticipate therefore that the statesman of this country will have more and more to attend to in the way of adjustments with foreigners before so long goes by, and in them all we may look for much vigorous talking before any change of war of something to be settled.

NOT QUITE IN PERSIA.

Rumors are now afloat to the effect that the assassination of the shah of Persia was due to the instigation of the oldest son of the deceased monarch, Mamud Mirza. This prince is on the mother's side, of more humble origin than his younger brother who has been proclaimed successor, but it is hinted that a contest will be inaugurated at the proper time, and it is alleged there now that the father was partial to the young as a result of the seclusion of the eldest son, the latter's life seems to be considered safe as long as it shows himself fair amongst the crowd in the city.

Mamud Mirza is described as a man of remarkable character, great ability and courage; in the provinces of which he is governor, he maintains an army, independent of the Grenadiers and better drilled than any other troops in Persia. His sympathies are said to be with England, and a movement on his part to the supreme power in Persia might possibly lead to a clash of interests between Great Britain and Russia. And the result would be, either a friendly division between the two great rival powers, or a Russian "protectorate" over Persia on the pattern of the "understanding" with China and Turkey. In either case, there would be a Persian problem added to the intricacies of European diplomacy.

Mamud Mirza is said to be quiet by nature and indifferent to suffering and bloodshed. A story is told about him, which illustrates this dark side of his character. A wealthy merchant of Teghran had been married by the prince to large sums, for in excess of his just taxes. The merchant appealed to the shah for redress, and he issued a mandate directing that restitution be made. When the merchant appeared before the prince with this royal decree, the latter took it and exclaimed exceedingly: "What do you thought to frighten your prince by getting me to the shah? You are indeed a crafty man! I little thought you a man of such courage. He brave a man as you must, indeed, have a brave heart—a large heart! I must see your heart and learn courage from you."

Then he gave this order to the executioner, "Take out the heart!" The mandate seized the terror-stricken merchant, cut him open on the spot, and tearing out his heart presented it on a dish to the prince.

The incident is thoroughly oriental. It is to be hoped that its country may escape such a ruler.

EXCESS INDEBTEDNESS INVALID.

The issuing of warrants in excess of legal indebtedness has been a theme of much discussion and worry in Salt Lake city and county; and so far as concerns county warrants of that character most prior to the inauguration of the state government, the Legislature, after considerable struggling, was induced to validate them. The legislative action, however, did not authorize cities or counties to go on in incurring indebtedness in excess of the legal limit; hence any such debts now or hereafter contracted are void.

The State Constitution provides that no county or subdivision thereof, or city, village or school district shall create in any one year a debt in excess of the taxes for that year, except by consent of the taxpaying voters; and when this consent is given at an election held for the purpose, the county cannot incur an indebtedness, including that already existing, exceeding two per cent of the assessed valuation of property, nor can a city or town exceed four per cent of such valuation; this restriction did not apply to cases where bonds, etc., had been arranged for prior to admission to the Union, but became operative on all instances done after statehood was accorded.

It is no secret that in Salt Lake city and county there are some who argue that an excess of the debt limit will can be quietly made in the end of the present year and be so finally settled that that such excess will be met and paid rather than that any "repudiation" shall take place. As such we suggest that there are others, and a very large number, too, who feel that the "repudiation" cry has gone far enough in the way of justifying the payment of illegally incurred debts, no matter for what purpose. The discussion and events of a few months ago, during the legislative session, and the provisions of law on the subject, which have been referred to so many times that they ought to be commonly understood, are regarded as a sufficient notice to all concerned that they allow themselves to become involved in excess of either city or county valuation of the legal limit they will be barred from making any collection. There is no reputation to be harmed; it is merely a sound refusal to take the Constitution and law to fight with so the latter has been in the past by certain officials.

The decision of the supreme court of California in what is known as the Hendrick case, handed down last Tuesday, should be a suggestion to prospective creditors clearly and emphatically that they will be within the legal case that if they want their pay, in the state referred to, the "repudiation" argument was worked to justification of exceeding the debt limitation, such a call was raised to stop it. Wallace Hendrick is an aid in this to have the authorities of the city and county of San Francisco enjoined from further increasing the municipal debt, as represented by the excess. At that time the debt limit had been passed by $225,000, with a prospect that by the close of the fiscal year it would reach $400,000. It was not clearly that such bills could not be paid because of the Constitutional provision, but during the making of the obligations, in the lower courts he lost his case, but the supreme court decided in his favor on every point. The court holds that an equity suit would lie to restrain the city and collection officers from proceeding to issue the illegal debt. The court says: "If the constitutional rule, that "it is not a tax, a check, upon the power of municipal officers to expend money beyond the resources provided for the current year. A barrier against indebtedness by municipal officers and local bodies has been erected by the constitution." Upon this, the court holds that the creditors for the amount of the excess of indebtedness cannot be paid, and will be enjoined in the information asked for.

We mention, then, this as a proper case for bringing an injunction, in the instance of a citizen. Will he be allowed time to develop legal cases and then proceed and obtaining leave for the payment of such debts?
