Notes by the Way

Judge Thomas Mercer, who still resides on his homestead on Lake Union, was the first monopolist in Seattle. When he left his farm on the prairies of Illinois for Puget sound he brought a span of horses and a wagon across the plains with him and when he arrived in Seattle in 1853 the settlers all turned out and cut a road from the bay to the lake, so that the wagon would have some place to run. Other roads were soon made, and it was not long before Mercer was enjoying a lucrative trade with his horses and wagon, the only team in town, as he had a monopoly of the express business. He hauled the first lumber used in the construction of board houses, and delivered wood and bark to the residences of the settlers, and afterward to the wharf for steamers. The teamster became very much attached to one of his animals, a faithful old mare, "Tib" by name, and when she died he had her buried a short distance from the home and her grave is still carefully marked.

Judge Mercer is credited with having named the lakes. In 1854 the settlers concluded that two such beautiful bodies of water should not longer go without names, and a mass meeting was called to attend to that matter. At that meeting Mercer suggested that the larger one should be named Washington, for the father of his country, and the smaller one Union, as sometime to become the connecting or uniting link between the larger lake and the Sound. The name of the little lake contained a prophecy that is now on the eve of fulfillment, since the general government has appropriated more than $150,000 for the commencement of the work, every dollar of which will be available just as soon as the right-of-way for the canal is secured. The date for the trial of the condemnation proceedings has been fixed, and there is now apparently little reason for further delay in the commencement of an undertaking to which the pioneers of Seattle have looked forward ever since the village was located.

Mr. W. G. Latimer calls attention to one of the pioneer saw mills in King county, not mentioned in my notes on early lumbering. This mill was built in 1853 by H. H. Tobin near the present town of Renton. The power was secured by damming Black river below the mouth of Cedar river, and turning the latter stream into Lake Washington. The lumber cut by this mill was rafted to Seattle and sold to the settlers or loaded onto vessels for the San Francisco market. The venture did not prove a success, in competition with the more advantageously located steam mills that were springing up all along the Sound about that time, and during the Indian war of 1855-6 the mill was burned by the Indians. The old settlers claim that the damming of Black river and the turning of Cedar river into it, raised the water of Lake Washington several feet.

Soon after Rev. D. E. Blaine and his good wife arrived in Seattle in the fall of 1853 to plant Methodism in the embryo city, they purchased the lots on which the New York block now stands, from C. D. Boren, one of the townsite proprietors, who had previously donated the lots adjoining, on which the Boston block is now located, for the first church built in the city. On the lots purchased from Mr. Boren, Rev. Blaine erected a neat little cottage and planted the remainder of the ground, after clearing it of trees and stumps, with apple seeds brought by him from New York. When the trees grown from the seeds were large enough they were grafted with choice fruit from Oregon, and for many years this ranked as one of the best little orchards on Puget sound. The property was afterwards sold to Mr. Dexter Horton, but several years ago became too valuable for orchard land, and the trees grown from New York seeds had to give way to the massive brick and stone structure which bears the name of the Empire state.

I have been asked several times of late to tell which is the oldest house now standing in Seattle. This is a very difficult question, because the old settlers themselves are not agreed on the subject. I have before me a picture of the town taken at a time when there were not over 40 houses in the place, and before the university ground were cleared or fenced, and when Fourth avenue was the eastern boundary, and all beyond that thoroughfare was dense forest. Among the houses shown in the picture which I recognize as still standing are the Terry home, situated on James street, between Third and Fourth avenues, and the Collins house, which stands in the rear of the Collins block, corner Second avenue and James street. This picture shows Yesler's mill, the first steam sawmill built on Puget sound, standing at the head of Commercial street, where the grass plot is now located in Pioneer Place. The largest and finest looking building in the place, outside of the university, was the Occidental hotel, and the most pretentious residence was the home of C. C. Terry. If any of the pioneers of the place can give dates as to the construction of any of the first houses constructed, which are still standing, I will be pleased to hear from them.

The first legal execution of the death penalty in the Puget sound region took place at Fort Steilacoom in the fall of 1849. In May of that year the Snoqualmie Indians had made an assault upon the Hudson Bay Co.'s post at Fort Nisqually, and killed a man named Wallace, an American. At this time Lewis county embraced all of Western Washington except Clarke county, and was set apart as the Third judicial district of Oregon. Peter H. Burnett had been appointed judge of that district, but as he had decided to leave the country he failed to qualify, thus leaving the position vacant. About this time Judge J. Q. Thornton was appointed sub-Indian agent for the country north of the Columbia river. He at once came to Fort Steilacoom and offered a reward of 80 blankets for the delivery of the guilty Indians to the officer in command of Fort Steilacoom. To obtain this prize Pat Kanim, a prominent member of the Snoqualmie tribe, delivered up six Indians, including his brother Kassas, for trial. To meet the emergency the legislature of Oregon passed an act temporarily annexing the third judicial district to the first, over which Judge William P. Bryant presided. The judge came to Fort Steilacoom and held a term of court, at which the six Indians were indicted. Judge Alonzo Skinner was appointed prosecuting attorney and David Stone was appointed by the court to defend the accused. Each of these attorneys received $250 for the service. Two of the accused, Kassas and Quallawowt, were found guilty, sentenced to death and speedily hanged in the presence of the whole Snoqualmie tribe and a vast concourse of other Indians. Gov. Lane took the view that the payment of a reward to the savages put a premium on murder of the whites and tended to bring into contempt the authority of the government. Owing to the disapproval of his course by the governor, Sub-Agent Thornton resigned his position and returned to Oregon. Gov. Lane's view of the matter was not borne out by subsequent events, for Pat Kanim was ever afterwards a firm friend of the whites.

Very soon after locating in Seattle Mr. A. A. Denny became acquainted with this Indian Pat Kanim, and that acquaintance and friendship stood the people of Seattle in good stead during the Indian war of 1855-6. In speaking of this matter Mr. Denny says: "After the White river massacre, while Lieut. Slaughter was operating on the old military road leading to Natchez pass, he sent word from Porter's prairie to Gov. Mason that Pat Kanim was dogging him at every step. On receipt of this dispatch Mason sent an order to Capt. Sterrett at Seattle to immediately arrest two of Pat Kanim's brothers, with all members of the tribe who were camping in Seattle, and put them in irons. Having previously assured Capt. Sterrett of my belief in the friendship of Pat Kanim and the members of his tribe, the captain did not feel willing to take so important a step without first consulting me. I went on board the Decatur, at the captain's request, and heard from him the startling news he had received. I felt satisfied Lieut. Slaughter was mistaken, and told the captain we had enemies enough to look after without attacking our friends. He was so strongly in favor of acting on Gov. Mason's orders that I finally proposed, if he would not disturb the Snoqualmies, I would be responsible for their good conduct and would prove that Slaughter was wrong by going to Pat Kanim's camp and bringing him in. He refused to let me leave town, but consented that I might send an express for Pat Kanim and stand responsible for the messengers until their return. Fortunately for me and probably for Pat Kanim, too, he was on hand within the time agreed upon. He had his women and children with him and also brought a cargo of mountain sheep, venison, horses and hides, specimens of which he took on board and presented to the captain, who expressed the greatest surprise and satisfaction of the proof furnished of the good faith and friendship of the Snoqualmies, and Pat Kanim was very soon employed by the governor, with a party of his tribe, to act as scouts, and they rendered good service during the continuance of the war." service during the continuance of the war."

The Ceramic Exhibition.

In the report of the third annual exhibition of the Seattle Ceramic Club, the generalizing was intended to cover those creditable showings that a lack of space prevented individualizing, and no intention of slighting any display entered into the report. There were a number of tables that had no cards, and while the work attracted attention and was spoken of in the article, the artists' names failed to appear in connection.

The prize table, entered for the Seller prize, contained, besides Mrs. Shank's tray, which won the still unnamed trophy, the rose jar by Mrs. Wing. It transpires that the winning was a matter of luck, as the committee was undecided on which to confer the prize. So the committee drew the names, with the result of the toss-up in favor of Mrs. Shank.

Miss Bessie Beach had a plate decorated with natural-looking clusters of currants, resting against the dark green leaves of the bush.

The bonboniere, with its marine treatment of shells and weeds, was highly effective and was the work of Mrs. H. K. Owens. Miss Hazlewood had a jardiniere, Miss McCullock a tray, Mrs. J. W. Pratt a tray, Miss Beach a jardiniere, and Mrs. G. W. Bacon a vase. The last-named piece was effective as an example of gilding.

Tables not mentioned yesterday were those of Miss Cole and Mrs. H. L. Fehren, Mrs. H. R. Cline, Mrs. H. K. Owens, the Misses Beach, Mrs. J. W. Pratt, Miss McCullock and Mrs. Bacon.

Complaint Against Bad Boys.

Complaints are made by householders near Ninth avenue and Alder street of a gang of boys living in the block at the rear of the court house, who for some weeks past have been pulling pickets off fences, defacing doors, windows, etc., and otherwise making themselves a nuisance to residents in that vicinity.

It's So Hard to Buy a Present for a Man,

Is an expression we often hear. It is not at all difficult if you will come to headquarters and seek advice from the haberdasher. We would suggest gloves, smoking jackets, umbrellas, suspenders, bath robes, dress shirts, dressing gowns, pajamas, night robes. We have entirely new lines of the above goods, and in addition the only complete stock of men's high-grade neckwear in Seattle. Cheasty's, Second avenue and James street.

Mackintosh Special:

The demand for high-grade Mackintoshes has not equaled our buyer's expectations, consequently we have too many of the celebrated Mandelberg Imported Mackintoshes on hand. These garments are made in Manchester, Eng., from material far superior to domestic goods. The vulcanized back being finished with silk, which makes the garment very light, besides giving it a very handsome effect. We will place this entire line on sale Monday morning at quick selling prices which will enable you to secure a fine imported garment at a less price than you would ordinarily pay for a domestic make. A first choice is worth something.
