WHEAT MAKES GAINS, BUT CORN LOSES GROUND.

EARLY MARKETS SHOWED WEAK UNDERTONE.

Later Wheat Showed Strength and Closed Higher, but Weakened and Closed Lower.

Office Republic,
Wednesday, Sept. 27, 1900.

There was become that was [illegible] from a bull point of view in the opening of the different grain markets this morning, and the outlook was far from cheerful. As on yesterday, there was an undertone of weakness displayed and the tendency of trading for some time after the opening showed that but slight interest was being taken. The changes in values, as a rule were not important, or in the case was considerable, and for the most part represented the turns. For months and months of some months, when endeavored to "scalp" small profits, first on one side of the account, and then on the other. A change for the better took place in the higher-priced grains and some approach to strength was shown, and the prices were by no means large and sending prices but slightly higher than those of yesterday. On the other hand corn continued to weaken, but, like the gains in wheat, the losses in corn were small.

The local wheat market this morning was just a little bit slow in getting a move on, and there were no significant changes in prices for some time after the opening, which was weak and lower. Later there was a fairly good undertone of strength developed, and for a time the market looked and acted as though it was wanting well for a full advance, but it failed to pan out, the advance falling to hold, prices sagging off and closing dull. Early in the morning, the advance falling to hold, prices sagging off and closing dull. Early in the morning, the advance falling to hold, prices sagging off and closing dull. Early in the morning