Trials and Triumphs of Genius.

Hunt's Merchants' Magazine for November comes to us as usual with its mercantile panoramic, and as usual laden with a valuable original intellectual merchandise. Commerce, as it ought to be, is its theme and poesy and genius its objects of exemplification, as will, we think be acknowledged by those who read the extract we are about to give from the third article in the Magazine, entitled 'Trials and Triumphs of American Genius in England.'

Mr Hunt, in introducing to the readers of his valuable magazine 'A Man' gives with a few touches of that felicity which the courage that dares the arm of the gallant Hotspur and persuades him to lower the cannon's mouth, [illegible] comparative insignificance.—With a [illegible] remark from Mr Hunt we have to [illegible] readers in [illegible] of Nasmyth, [illegible] as every [illegible] reader.

[illegible] are not the [illegible] of the [illegible] and hungry [illegible] (by the [illegible] the [illegible] in Jonathan's Lyre of Savage, and G. Thomas's Vision of Walk [illegible] will read the following [illegible] with a distinguished gentleman in other [illegible]—a chapter of [illegible] biography, [illegible] with like interest for the [illegible] it not and [illegible] the truth, but is written with the energetic pen of genius.

'Mr Rammington went to Rutland, arriving in London early in January 1847. He went to use his engineering language 'inch-work of a man,' like the old philosopher, he sought for the one mind capable of comprehending his scheme. He carried with him [illegible] and an empty purse.'

'The story of Mr Rammington's success is here, tell it the lips of others, as was [illegible] in [illegible] for describing his struggles and probation. He later would be marred by any attempt on our part to add or amplify.'

STAFFORD STAFFORDSHIRE ENGLAND,
August 15, 1848

My dear sir,—I should have written sooner, but as I had nothing pleasant to say. I reached London on the 1st of January 1847, with [illegible] my friends, which was just as the [illegible] I [illegible] A[illegible] and [illegible] the money. I assure you I will never desert you. I commenced operations at once, on the supposition that in the overgrown city, I would at least enlist one man. But Englishmen are not Americans. An Englishman will advance any amount on an absolute certainty, but not one penny where there is the slightest risk, if he can get the whole world to [illegible]. I spent the first five months looking for this man with unparalleled perseverance and [illegible] [illegible] I [illegible] that a person in London [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] myself. He [illegible] my work [illegible] me with wretched [illegible] bread on which I lived [illegible] months. I [illegible] my [illegible] I [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] and I no longer go among [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
