He took it all very quietly, only A TTORNEY AND COUNSELLOR AT giving a long, weary sigh when I told A Law, Alexandria, La. him, I must beg him not to repeat his visit. He looked so weak and ill, that I was obliged to ask him to take a glass of wine-an offer which he seemed to accept with great pleasure.

I got out the sherry and biscuits, and placed them on the table between us, and he took a glass and drank it off greedily.

It was not without some difficulty that I could get him to tell me of George's death. He related, with evident reluctance how they had gone out to shoot a white bear, which they had seen on an iceberg stranded along the shore. The top of the berg was ridged like the roof of a house, sloping down on one side, to the edge of a tremendous overhanging precipice. They Attorney and Counsellor at Law and pipes will receive prompt attention. had scrambled along the ridge in order to get nearer the game, when George incautiously ventured on the sloping side.

"I called out to him," said Grieve "and begged him to come back, but too late. The surface was as smooth and slippery as glass. He tried to turn back, but slipped and fell. And then began a horrible scene. Slowly, slowly, but with ever-increasing motion, ho began to slide down toward the edge. There was nothing to grasp at—no irregularity or projection on the smooth face of the ice. I tore off my coat and hastly attaching it to the stock of my gun, pushed the latter toward him but it did not reach far enough. Before I could lengthen it, by tying my cravat to it, he had slid further away, and more quickly. I shouted in agony; but there was no one within hearing. He, too, saw his fate was sealed: and he could only tell me to bring his last farewell to you, and-to her! (here Grieve's voice broke,) and itwas all Civil Engineer over! He clang to the edge of the precipics instinctively for one second, and was gone ?"

Just as Grieve uttered the last words his jaw fell! his eyeballs seemed ready to start from his head; he sprang to his feet, pointed at something behind me, and then, flinging up his arms, fell with a scream, as if he had been shot. He was seized with an epileptic fit.
