PITTSTON CONDENSATIONS.

General News Discussed in Brief Paragraphs.

Special to the Scranton Tribune.

PITTSTON, Pa., April 18.—The Juvenis Social club held a social and banquet last evening. The dancing was held in their rooms on South Main street. Supper was served by Landlord Snyder in the Eagle hotel dining parlors.

At a meeting of the Pittston hospital trustees Monday evening the terms of the members of the board were allotted as follows: For three years, T. B. Lace, John B. Law, G. S. Ferris, W. L. Watson; two years, Theo. Hart, J. L. Cake, E. G. Mercer, S. B. Bennett; one year, W. H. Rutledge, S. P. Fenn, Alex. Bryden, J. A. Collier.

Anthony Belnosh, who was arrested by Constable P. W. Earley last week, was brought before Judge Lynch yesterday morning on a habeas corpus hearing. C. F. Bohan appeared for the defendant, and Constable Earley was prosecutor. The judge held the prisoner under $2,500 bail which he was unable to furnish and was remanded to jail.

J. A. Tanbill successfully raised the stack and cupola of the new steel range.

How Classic Poets Are Killed.

The intellectual condition of our times differs from that of all preceding ages in no other point so much as in its attitude toward the writings of the dead. To the class whom Pope addressed, Shakespeare and Milton were phantoms, Chaucer and Spenser not so much as names. The only doubt was whether Alexander Pope was man enough to arrest attention by the intrinsic merits of his poetry. If his verse was admitted to be good, his public were not distracted by a preference for other verse which they had known for a longer time. This remained true until about a generation ago.

The activity of the dead is now paramount, and threatens to paralyze original writing altogether. In this great throng of resuscitated souls, all of whom have forfeited their copyright, how is the modern poet to exist? He has no longer to compete—as "his great forefathers did, from Homer down to Ben"—with the leading spirits of his own generation, but with the genius of the world. At every turn the thronging company of ghosts impedes and disheartens the modern writer, and it is no wonder if the new Orpheus throws down his lyre in despair when the road to his desire is held by such an invincible army of specters.

On the whole, however, it is highly unlikely that the antiquarian passion of our age will last. There are already signs of its wearing out. As to the old poets, one by one they pass into text books and are lost. Chaucer is done for, and so is Milton; Goldsmith is annotated, Scott prepared for "local examinations," even Byron, the loose, the ungrammatical, is edited as a school book. We shall see Wordsworth captured, Shelley boiled down for the use of babes, and Keats elaborately annotated, with his blunders in classical mythology exposed. The schoolmaster is the only friend the poet of the future dares to look to, for he alone has the power to utterly destroy the loveliness and mystery which are the charm of the old poets. But even a second rate verse writer may hope to live by the side of an Elizabethan poet edited for the Clarendon press.—Edmund Gosse in Forum.

A Practical Man.

"Say, Mr. Dentist," said a gaunt, raw boned man from the haymaking district, as he entered a down town dental establishment, "what air your charges fer doc torin' teeth?"

"Twenty-five cents for administering gas, from $1.50 up for filling, and fifty cents for extracting."

"I don't care fer all that rubbish. I don't care fer your administ'rin', ner your fillin', ner your extractin'. What I want to know is what it's goin' to cost to hev this dod gasted throbbin' wisdim teeth jerked."—Buffalo Express.
