CITY DIRECTORY.

Wheeling as it was, is, and will be.

There is much in the early history of our city, its first settlement, the character of its founders, its steady progress and its present prosperity, that is deeply interesting to our readers, and which, if published in full, would make a very instructive volume; showing the rapid march of science and improvement, the wonderful changes effected by time in the appearance of localities, in the character and pursuits of men, in the customs of society, and the manner of conducting the business and affairs of life. Wheeling, which within the recollection of many of our citizens, was but a frontier settlement, a mere outpost on the borders of civilization, inhabited by a few brave pioneers who loved the danger and excitement of a border life; from this small beginning it has rapidly grown to a populous city of the interior, and become one of the great manufacturing and commercial marts of the west. The settlement was first made by Col. Ebenezer Zane, and his brothers, Silas and Jonathan, and a few others from the south branch of the Potomac, who settled here in the year 1769. Col. Zane and his brothers, with Col. Shepperd, were considered as the fathers of the settlement. They were master spirits, and acted a prominent part in the early history of the city. Many of their descendants are yet residents of the city and vicinity. There are different versions as to the origin of the name given to the city. Bowen's Directory, published in 1839, says: "A very intelligent merchant of this city says that in very early times a European gentleman, in the capacity of a Catholic priest, direct from Europe, of the name of Wheelan, on a missionary excursion among the aborigonees of this country, on descending the Ohio river pitched his encampment at the mouth of the present well known Wheeling creek, where he proceeded with the discharge of his missionary duties among the red men of the forest. After a few months' stay he departed and left a name behind him which will distinguish this celebrated spot till time shall be no more, since which it is written Wheeling."

It is stated in a communication to the American Pioneer, that Wheeling was originally called Weeling, which signifies the place of a head. The following tradition explanatory of this was obtained from Mr. John Brittle, who was taken prisoner by the Delawares, lived with them five years and acquired their language. In the earliest period of the settlement of Pennsylvania, some white settlers descended the Ohio river in a boat, and stopping at the mouth of Wheeling Creek were killed by the Delawares. The savages cut off the head of one of their victims and placing it on a pole with the face towards the river called the spot Weeling. The Indians informed Mr. Brittle that the head was placed there to guard the river.

Fort Henry which was built as a place of refuge for the early settlers stood somewhere near the site now occupied by the Second Ward Market House. It was built on open ground and covered a space of about three quarters of an acre. In form it was a paralelogram, having a block house at each corner, with lines of stout pickets, about eight feet high, extending from one block house to the other, and enclosing the whole.

The history of the seige of this fort in 1777, and the thrilling incidents connected with the gallant defence of the heroic garrison have become matters of history with which every one is familiar. A traveler in this region in 1802, describes Wheeling as it then appeared. He writes, "at present it contains about seventy houses, built of planks and seperated by an interval of several toises. They form only one street, having one road in the middle. Here are twelve or fifteen well provided stores from which the inhabitants for twenty miles round are supplied. This small town also participates in the exportation trade, carried on between Pittsburg and the Western country. Several of the traders of Philadelphia prefer sending their merchandise here, although it is a day's journey further. This slight inconvenience is amply compensated by the advantage they derive in avoiding the long circuit made by the Ohio on quitting Pittsburg, and the numerous shallows which retard navigation during the summer."

If this writer could visit Wheeling at the present time, he would find cause for great astonishment, and would also find that his views in regard to shipments to the West had been well sustained, and that not only a few but thousands of the merchants of Philadelphia, and the east seek this as an outlet for their products and merchandise. The following statistics will give some idea of the steady growth of the city in population: In 1810 the population was 914; in 1820, 1,567; 1830, 5,221; 1840, 7,885; 1850, 11,435; 1860, 14,083. At the present time the population, not including the suburbs, is estimated at 20,000.

The steady and rapid increase of our population is significant, but is not so great an indication of the progress of our city as is the increase of our wholesale business houses and manufacturing establishments, and the changed pursuits of the inhabitants, all of which are solid, substantial and permanent in their character, and will remain and increase through all the mutations of trade and commerce.

The population in the earlier history of the city was of that character peculiar to the times and the organization of Southern society. It lacked a spirit of industry and enterprise, and was disposed to a life of rollicking ease. As the advance of civilization brought wealth and security to the sons of the early settlers, they gave themselves up to the sports and enjoyments of the day, hunting, fishing, horse-racing, and oth- fashionable amusements of the time occupied the attention of the wealthier portion of the community. The poorer classes were infected by the same spirit, and only performed such an amount of labor as was actually necessary to obtain a subsistence, the larger portion of them finding employment on the river during certain portions of the year, whereby they obtained sufficient means to enjoy the seasons of idleness and to participate in the frolicsome sports of the day; a few of the more enterprising availing themselves of the great natural advantages of the place as a point of communication between the East and West, established themselves as commission and forwarding merchants, and as such were extensively known throughout the country. The great natural advantages of the location as a manufacturing site soon began to attract the attention of capital and enterprise; the location of the national road through this section of the country gave an impetus that has steadily tended to increase and develop these great natural advantages. In later years the opening of the various lines of railroads centering at this point, has served to make Wheeling one of the most important points in the West. Her shipping facilities, with her inexhaustible supply of cheap fuel, has made her essentially a manufacturing city. These natural advantages has also attracted capital and enterprise from abroad, and infused into her people a spirit of industry and zeal that has placed Wheeling in the first rank among the manufacturing cities of the country. Her nails, glass, railroad iron, wagons and cigars have obtained a national reputation and now take precedence of all others in all the markets of the Union. Her population is of the most industrious character, and there is not another city of her size that is as free from that contemptible character and drone called loafer as the city of Wheeling. She has nobly stood by the government in our great national struggle, and as a border city in what was the leading southern State, has made a record of which she will never have occasion to blush. Her prosperity is established on a sure foundation, and the dawn of her future is brilliant with the prospect of success.

The following list embraces, as we believe, all the manufacturing establishments and business houses of the city. We have endeavored to make it as complete as limited time and opportunity would permit. It is possible that some may have been overlooked that should have appeared. If there be any such omissions, we assure all those interested that it is not intentional, as we have desired that every house should appear under its proper heading. We have also found some difficulty in properly classifying some of the houses where they were engaged in a mixed business, embracing different branches of trade, or where the parties were both manufacturers and merchants.—Our space not allowing us opportunity to multiply the headings, as far as practicable, the list has been arranged in alphabetical order, without reference to the extent of the business done by the different houses or firms.
