DEMOCRATS WIN IN CHICAGO

Elect Majority of New Board of Aldermen---Rebuke to Mayor Busse

Chicago, April 6.—Enemies of Mayor Busse today see a popular rebuke of the city administration in the results of yesterday's aldermanic election when a majority of the aldermen elected were democrats. The new council will be democratic on a partisan division by a majority of six, eleven republican aldermen having been defeated for re-election.

The democratic managers hail the result as an indication of democratic victory in the county election next fall and in the mayoralty election next spring when Mayor Busse's successor will be chosen.

The result of the liquor elections held in 200 cities and towns of the state was apparently a sweeping victory for the wets. The anti-saloonists carried a few towns, while a number of cities that two years ago went dry, went wet yesterday.

The tabulated result is:

Dry towns that went wet, 39; wet towns that went dry, 19; wet towns that stayed wet, 72; dry towns that stayed dry, 112.

The principal towns that went wet were Clinton, Decatur, Pontiac, Mattoon, Rockford, Aurora, Bloomington, Danville, Elgin, Freeport, Joliet, Lincoln, Moline, Rock Island, Springfield, Sterling and Waukegan.

The first five named were previously dry. These results leave a total of 32 dry counties in Illinois out of a total of 102.

SPECIAL TO THE NEWS.

Austin, Tex., April 6.—Governor Campbell has ordered a detachment of state rangers to Centreville to prevent further disorder growing out of the killing of Frank Bates, Jr., the wounding and attempted lynching of his son, Dolly Bates, and the fatal wounding of Deputy Sheriff J. S. St. John.

The Bates', father and two of his sons, Dolly and Frank, were on trial at Centreville for the murder of Ben Moon, a prominent citizen. Yesterday the two Bates broke from jail. They had been provided with weapons from some unknown source and as they fled into the woods one of the fugitives shot Deputy Sheriff St. John, who was in close pursuit.

An armed posse of citizens took up the chase and overtook the fugitives. Frank Bates refused to surrender to leave the house at 5 o'clock Wednesday morning by neighbors, who reported the fact to the police.

The first inkling of the crime came from Earl Koons, a son, aged twelve years, who rushed out of the house about 10 o'clock clad only in his night clothes. His face was battered and he was suffering pain from wounds inflicted by the murderer of his mother and father, probably with a brick which was found nearby.

When neighbors arrived on the scene Mrs. Koons was dead. She is known to have been murdered at least five hours before. Koons was still alive. He died a few minutes before noon Wednesday at Ingleside hospital, where he was hurried in Miller & Blanchard's ambulance.

BOY WAS BLEEDING.

It was almost 10 o'clock when Earl Koons, the twelve-year-old son of the victims, emerged from the home clad only in his night gown. He was in a dazed condition and was bleeding from wounds alongside of his head at the left side.

Mrs. Scroggy, an elderly woman residing next door west, noticed the child on the outside, and being surprised to find him in that condition at such an hour of the day he was cared for, and a hurried investigation gave the neighbors the first information that a horrible crime had been committed.

Not finding Mrs. Koons in the lower part of the house a visit to the bed chamber occupied by her husband and herself was next visited and a horrible sight met the gaze of those who went there. As soon as the door was pushed open the lifeless body of Mrs. Koons was found near a window at the west side of the room, her head resting in a pool of partially congealed blood. She was robed in her night dress, her hair was strewn over her head in a mass and her face was unrecognizable from the blood.

MAN STILL ALIVE.

Mr. Koons was not dead when the discovery was made, his body lying on the floor near the bed which stood in the northeast corner of the room. He was still moaning, but unable to say a word. His face had the appearance of being badly swollen and was covered with blood. He was picked up and placed on the bed and remained there until the arrival of Dr. Harry March, the coroner, Chief Smith, Detective Ryan and the physicians, who had made hurried trips to the place. No examination of the injured man's wounds was made by the coroner at this time, it being deemed advisable to rush him to the hospital. Miller & Blanchard's ambulance was in waiting, and the man was removed to Ingleside hospital as soon as possible.

The body of Mrs. Koons was removed to the morgue in another ambulance.

The physicians went to the home of Mrs. Scroggy, where the little boy was given attention. He did not appear to be seriously hurt and was able to give a disconcerted story to Coroner March and Chief Smith. He said that burglars were in the house day evening. SCENE OF MURDER.

The house in which the murder was committed is just immediately west of the Gilliam Manufacturing company's plant and when the news spread that a murder had been committed there many of the employes visited the scene After the body of Mrs. Koons had been carried away to the ambulance the injured man was taken from the house it was closed to public view by the police officers, who took the bloody bedding with them to the police station.

POLICE WERE BUSY.

The child's bed in the rear room showed indications of being used, but the covers were not mussed enough to indicate that the party who slept there spent the entire night in the bed. It had the appearance of only being occupied a portion of the time.

Detective Ryan and Chief Smith lost no time in getting what information they could obtain. They learned that Cletus Willaman was seen to come from the Koons home about 5:30 o'clock in the morning, carrying a suit case in his hand. He started down toward the central portion of the city, seeming to be in a hurry to take a train.

Neighbors say that the married life of Mr. and Mrs. Koons was always happy and that there was never any friction between them. They declare that they never had any family trouble.

Members of the family of G. Gloss, living next door north of the Koons home on the Savannah avenue side, declare that they heard several shots fired during the early morning hours, but did not suspect that the sounds came from the Koons home. No screams were heard.

GAS WAS ESCAPING.

When Raeder entered the Koons home he detected the fumes of natural gas, and when an examination was made it was discovered that some of the gas jets that had been turned on were still open and the gas was escaping

It is thought that the escaping gas affected the little boy and accounted for his dazed condition. The theory of a burglary having been committed was soon dispelled from the minds of Detective Ryan and Chief Smith, for there was no indication that the [illegible] ransacked as they [illegible] of her father and stepmother, her children being ill with measles.

Chief of Police Smith, Detective Ryan and other officials Wednesday afternoon made another trip to the home where the murder took place, accompanied by Marian Koons, the son of the dead man.

Police have been placed at all the railroad stations to intercept Willaman if he attempts to take a train. The various ticket agents do not remember of a man of his description purchasing a ticket during the early hours.

Willaman usually wears a large furlined overcoat and he could easily have been recognized if he presented himself at the ticket window. He is well known in this city.

BOY NOT BADLY INJURED.

Earl Koons, the little son, was not badly hurt. He had a few slight cuts and bruises on his head and one of his ears was cut, the attending physician finding it necessary to stitch the wound on his ear. The little fellow was greatly excited and between his sobs told what he knew of the story. He said that burglars were in the house and that they were tusseling with his parents and intimated that one of them looked like Cletus Willaman.

SENTIMENT NOT WEIGHED IN NATIONAL GAME

Pennants are impossible with a lot of dead timber. Champions demand high class players in all departments of the game. Club owners and managers are always on the alert for men who can deliver the goods just on the other clubs. Baseball is truly a survival of the fittest.

When a youngster breaks into the big league from the bushes the first thing the opposing players on every other team do is to try and discover his weakness, if he has any. Old players realize their success depends on their ability to outguess and outplay the newcomers. The youngsters realize they must show to as good, if not better, advantage than the veterans, provided they are to remain in fast company.

Any time a minor leaguer breaks into the majors with a batting average that threatens to drive all the star twirlers out of the organization the pitchers at once begin to devote all their time and attention to the new arrival. Not knowing what the youngster likes, the star twirler may feed him a fast one, letter high, only to see the bush leaguer jar the leftfield fence.

He will go through his entire assortment for the purpose of finding out just what kind of a ball the youngster finds trouble in hitting, should he happen to have a weakness. Possibly, after experimenting for some time, he discovers that the ambitious youngster has trouble hitting a curve ball on the outside at the knee. If such happens to be the youngster's weakness, woe unto him, for in a very few days every pitcher [illegible]

INDIANA NOW IN THE INSURGENT CLASS

Indianapolis, Ind., April 6.—The Republican state convention platform, taken in connection with the keynote speech of Senator Beveridge is regarded as putting Indiana decidedly in the insurgent class.

That the president understands it thus is indicated by the word today that he has cancelled his trip to Indianapolis in May. No reason has yet been given for this action, but it is generally understood that his displeasure is the cause.
