OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

The President Elect and his Tormentors—How to Obtain a Clerkship and How to Keep It—The Civil Service Bill—The Pretty Girl and the President—Grant and Hancock.

[Correspondence of the Ohio Statesman.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 17, 1868.

The visit of the President elect to New York and West Point was made simply for the purpose of attending to private business, and was not a flight to escape another impetuous charge of office seekers as has been represented. I have it from good authority that the General will hereafter tolerate any public demonstration that may be offered in his favor by the class referred to, but will invariably hand over the names of his tormentors to Gen. Badeau, of his staff, who will record them among the "outs" of March next.

An uneasy Auditor is the gentleman whose name was connected with the late proposed visit of Treasury officials to General Grant. Obtaining his appointment under President Lincoln in 1863, he was known as a War Democrat. Since the close of the war and up to a few days prior to the election he was a strong supporter of President Johnson, with an abiding faith in his views of reconstruction, and the apparent belief that he, the President, was the best abused man in the world. A change came over the spirit of the Auditor's dream, however, and a few days prior to the election no one feeding at our public crib exhibited more zeal in supporting the principles of the Republican party than he. Indeed, he even went so far as to threaten the utter demolition of the large columns of figures named by Mr. Delmar; but afterwards thought better of it and satisfied himself with having the fact of his tremendous zeal in behalf of Grant telegraphed throughout the country. He it was who had prepared an adulatory speech for the ear of the President-elect, whose timely visit to New York saved him from infliction. General Spinner it was who, when asked to join the knot of parasites, said he would have nothing to do with such a d—d nonsensical proceeding.

APPOINTMENTS AND DISCHARGE IN THE DEPARTMENTS.

The proposed Civil Service bill providing for a rigid examination of all present clerks in the Departments and of all who may hereafter become applicants for position under the Government might dispose of very many incompetents for the time being, but would ultimately prove a lamentable failure. Influence not to be withstood would be brought to bear on the examining board and the result would be that it would finally become a useless appendage to the Government machine. The pressure in every department of the Government is always heavy and some of the means used to possess and retain clerical positions are ingenious and amusing. Here is one way which usually proves successful, especially with a young man from the West who desires a clerkship in the Treasury Department. He writes for publication in his village journal a description of the Capital, and advised by shrewd old coons who had been through the mill, devotes a long paragraph to Auditor L., whom he describes as a most gentlemanly personage, a man of wonderful ability and a remarkably efficient public servant. The next day the applicant's friend, generally an unscrupulous M. C., happens "to drop in" on Auditor L, and after a pleasant chat, during which the M. C. grows remarkably complimentary, he says:

"By the way, Mr. Auditor, I saw a handsome notice of you a few days since, in the Journal; I wish I had the paper. O! I think I have it with me after all." The little seven-by-nine sheet is spread before Auditor L., and the fulsome paragraph and with evident relish. "That is very handsome; I wonder who wrote it?" "A young man of great ability, sir; corresponds regularly for the press; the press, you know, is a powerful lever in this country." "No doubt of it sir," rejoins the tickled Auditor. "Do you ever see my name mentioned in any other paper, sir?" "O! yes, quite frequently; we public men must pay the penalty, you know, of holding exalted positions; the newspapers will talk about us."

Finally bidding the Auditor good day, our M. C. gives him the paper and after a few more pleasant remarks retires. A week later he calls again.

"Mr. Auditor, I have a young friend who desires a position in some Department; what's the prospect?"

"None at all, sir," rejoins the Auditor, "places all full; thousands of applications every day."

After expatiating upon the merits of the would-be clerk for some time Mr. C. suddenly recollects: "O, Mr. Auditor, do you remember my showing you a paper the other day containing a notice of yourself?"

"Very well, sir."

"Well, I just remember! the young man I refer to is the author of that letter. I am sorry you have no room for him; an excellent young man; a fine writer; good day, sir."

"Wait a moment. There may be a vacancy in a few days. At any rate, there will be no harm in sending the young man here and I'll see what can be done for him; a vacancy may occur, you know."

To make a long story short, the young man is appointed on Auditor L.'s recommendation, and if he is really a shrewd person, manages to retain his position by writing puffs of Auditor L., always taking especial care that the latter sees them and knows the source from which they emanate.

One way to make sure of a clerkship, is to play the part of servant and admirer of the chief of division or head of the room, by assisting him on with his overcoat, loaning him your umbrella and going home in the rain yourself, by complimenting him frequently, by brushing a stray speck from his coat and by a favoring servility which, sad to say, very many of the Department barnacles do not seem to deem it incompatible with their manhood to exhibit on all occasions.

For a lady applicant for clerical honors, a pretty face is almost indispensable. About six months ago the young ladies desiring positions in the printing division of the Treasury Department conceived the bold plan of soliciting a recommendation from President Johnson himself. Arriving at the White House their timid but anxious little hearts failed them. One wanted the other to approach His Excellency first, and vice versa, and some time was spent in debating the questing of precedence.—At last, the bolder and prettier of the two agreed to see the President first, and was ushered into the august presence. Singularly enough, her interview with the President ended by his giving her an earnest recommendation for an appointment, which she received from the Superintendent of the Printing Division on the following day. The other young lady, on hearing her companion's success, full of hope, saw the President, who, smiling at her assurance in coming to him for a recommendation, said it was really impossible. She was very deserving, no doubt, and he hoped she would succeed, but of course she could not expect him to recommend parties whom he knew nothing about, &c. The key to the discrimination exercised by the President in the case of the two ladies, is found in an impudent remark of the notorious S. H. Clark, formerly Superintendent of the Printing Division of the Treasury Department who, after reading the recommendation of the President, said to the fair bearer: "Do you know, Miss, why the President recommends you?"

The young lady modestly replied that she did not. "I'll tell you why," said the brazen clerk, "because you are pretty!" The young lady's cheeks flushed, but she could not afford to be saucy and so swallowed the impertinence, and the next day found her pretty digits busy in counting Uncle Sam's greenbacks. That young lady may be classed with the "Ins," at least until the 4th of March next, the entry in the appointment journal reading, "Miss ——— appointed—recommended by President Johnson"!!

"DON'T HITCH HORSES."

Several telegraphic correspondents, a few days after the arrival of General Grant from the West, announced that the President and General Hancock had called on him at army headquarters, which was entirely erroneous and was corrected at the instance of the President elect himself. It is easier to discover why the statement was incorrect so far as regards the President than in case of General Hancock, whose omission to extend the courtesy referred to is commonly attributed to political differences. Such is not the case, however, for the mutual dislike of the two generals has its foundation in a deeper cause than is generally imagined—an old war wound inflicted by Gen. Grant and one which will probably never be healed during the life time of either man. Hancock is known as a gallant, impetuous and chivalric soldier, and it was while on the march from the Wilderness to Petersburg that Gen. Grant administered a delicate rebuke to the former, for his over zealousness, which the proud nature of General Hancock could not brook and which he has never forgiven. This is the true cause of the ill-feeling existing between two brave soldiers, who can never be reconciled, for the reason that one is too proud to forget and the other too firmly grounded in his convictions of right and wrong to apologize.

RECIPE FOR MAKING NATURAL BREAD.—Bread, light, sweet, delicious and eminently wholesome, may be made by mixing good unbolted wheat meal with cold water, making a paste of proper consistence, which can only be determined by experiments, pouring or dropping it quickly into a heated pan, (that with concave departments is best,) and placing it quickly into a hot oven, and baking as quickly as possible without burning. The heat of the oven and pan suddenly coagulates the gluten of the outside, which retains the steam formed within, and each particle of water being interspersed with a particle of flour, and expanded into steam, separates the particles into cells, and being retained by the gluten, which is abundant in this natural flour, till it is cooked, the mass remains porous and digestible, and, containing no carbonic acid gas, is wholesome when eaten immediately, and of course equally so on becoming cold.

But for family bread, if not eaten till it has stood in pure air till the carbonic acid gas in the cells is exchanged for the oxygen of the air, there is no important objection to bread made from good unbolted wheat meal with fresh yeast. It contains all the elements necessary for feeding the muscles and brains, and for producing all the fat and animal heat required, and contains no materials essentially deleterious; and bread thus made from good superfine flour is only negatively deleterious, having lost its food for muscles and brains; and it need not, therefore, be discarded if at the same meal these elements are supplied in lean meat, fish, or cheese, or other food containing similar elements; but if eaten with butter or sugar only, and nothing else, would soon make of us bloated and stupid idiots.—Philosophy of Eating.
