The Late Pierre Bonaparte

Prince Pierre, whose death occurred on the 8th inst., was suddenly made famous by the fact that in 1870 he shot and killed M. Victor Noir, a young journalist who had called at his house, in Paris, in company with M. Ulric de Fonvielle, to ask satisfaction for a violent article that had been published by the Prince in a Corsican journal. Arraigned for this offence before a specially constituted court, summoned in the city of Tours, Prince Pierre became the lion of the hour, and the whole of his very curious past history was brought to light. The third son of Lucien Bonaparte, Prince of Canino, he was born at Rome in 1815 and educated under the care of his grandmother, Mme. Letitia. In 1832 he went to America to join his uncle Joseph, ex King of Spain, and was sent on an expedition into Columbia under the command of General Santander, who appointed him his aid de camp. Even at this early period of his career he Prince had acquired a reputation for being of almost ungovernable temper. He fought well, showing an contemptuous a disregard for his own life as for those of others. He was a pleasant companion, too, when in good humor, and not ungenerous; but at the least word that smacked of a slight he would boil over and defy for blood. After a couple of years' sojourn in America, Prince Pierre returned to Rome and began conspiring. He was then an ardent liberal, as were all the Bonapartes when out of place. The doctrines which he imbibed in America impelled him to aim at the overthrow of the Holy See and the institution of a commonwealth in its place, and to compass these ends he was not too nice as to the means he planned or he society he kept. The result was that in 1836 he was ordered to leave the Papal States. He refused to do so, and on receiving the visit of five police agents sent to arrest him showed fight. The police chief was killed, two of the others were seriously wounded, and if Prince Pierre succumbed it was only because he had himself received wounds which placed him hors de combat. This trick would have cost a lesser person his head; it procured the Prince a couple of years' incarceration in Fort St. Angelo. On his release he shipped for America, led a roving life in the United States in the hope of meeting fortune, then turned up in England, whence, after a few months' sojourn, he started for unexplained reasons for Corfu. In the course of a sporting expedition into Albania he contrived to pick a quarrel with the Palikares and almost single handed (for his two Greek aides were not of much use) waged a deadly combat against nineteen of them. It is true that the Prince kept his back against a tree and had fire arms, whereas his antagonists had only swords, sticks and spears; nevertheless nineteen to one are good odds, and it was no mean achievement to kill seven out of the lot and set the rest scampering like hares.

The British government, however, took a one eyed view of the exploit and Prince Pierre was requested to depart from the coasts of Italy and Greece. He offered his sword to Mehemet Ali, who declined. Then he memorialized Louis Philippe's government to be allowed to serve in the French army, but was here spurned also; he next seemed to have tendered his services to half a dozen German and Italian States, but being everywhere rebuffed he eventually settled in London, waiting for something to turn up. The French Revolution of 1848 occurred, and immediately Prince Pierre hastened to Paris. In consideration of his father Lucian's republicanism, the good natured Provisional government conferred on him the military rank of major, and simultaneously, the electors of Corsica returned him to the Constituent Assembly. He voted and spoke up for all measures of a radical tendency. He was anti military, anti clerical, anti monarchical. He was for the freedom of the press, for the abolition of the salt tax, for annihilating the communists of June; he had a good word to say for Robespierre; he extolled Danton, and he held that all hereditary titles should be suppressed. On questions personally affecting his cousin, the President, however, he was always to be found in the Ministerial ranks, and the mere insinuation to the possibility that Louis Napoleon should perjure himself by perpetrating a coup d'etat was enough to bring him on to his legs, launching virulent abuse at the insinuators. He once slapped the face of an elderly royalist nobleman who had expressed doubts as to the President's honesty; on another occasion he had to be literally held down in his seat to prevent him from flying at the throat of a republican, who had styled the Bonapartes "birds of prey." Being sent to take part in the siege of Zurich, in Algeria, he coolly returned to France without leave, under the pretence that his political duties were of more importance to him than the slaying of Arabs. Not a little to his surprise and somewhat to the annoyance of the President, General d'Hautpoul, the War Minister cashiered him. A stormy debate took place in the Chamber on the rights and wrongs of this affair, but the War Minister came out victorious and Prince Pierre by way of solacing himself, challenged a Ministerial journalist to fight a duel and half slew him. Shortly after these events the coup d'etat deprived Prince Pierre of his seat in the Legislature and restored him to private recession. Of late years he has lived alone at Versailles in the Hotel de France, where he had two rooms on the first floor. He was tormented by gout and never left his room unless to go to mass on Sundays, for the old freethinker was now a Catholic. He depended upon a small income that Prince Jerome paid him. His wife and daughter, the latter a sculptress of some talent, lived apart from him. His son, Roland Bonaparte, recently did much to rebuild the fortunes of the family by marrying Mlle. Blanc of Monaco notoriety, and was able to render some assistance to his father, who has died, as ten years ago nobody believed he would have died, in his bed.
