The Anti Jewish Riots.

The London Telegraph publishes, from an eye witness the subjoined account of the recent disturbances at Kieff: "When I reached Alexander street I found a dense crowd, through which a small detachment of infantry and Cossacks was trying to make its way. Toward 5 o'clock I was at the entrance of the Rodolia street, where the door of a shop was being broken open by a group of the rioters in presence of mounted police with infantry and Cossacks close at hand. In a few seconds the door gave way amid the enthusiastic hurrahs of the mob. The goods and furniture found in it were thrown into the street and immediately pulled to pieces. In front of St. Andrew's Church I saw a Jew who happened to be passing by attacked and maltreated by the crowd in the most barbarous manner, and that in the presence of the mounted police. I saw a group of miscreants deliberately wreck the house of Salomon Brodzky, which is situated in the Demiatievska ja "ulitza," exactly opposite the old Kieff police station. Valuable furniture and other objects of price were hurled from the second floor balcony into the street, and there destroyed by those who remained below. Three mounted policemen, one of them an officer, besides several constables on foot, calmly looked on as if they had no right to interfere. I may mention that the whole attitude of the police could lead to no other conclusion than that these scenes were going on under their special protection. Toward seven o'clock I walked to the suburb of Podol. As I arrived at the Seminary street the crowd was plundering a grocer's shop. To the right and left of the building stood troops of the line with fixed bayonets, and a little further off were three officers with unsheathed swords. All kinds of grocery stores were thrown among the bystanders, who cheered the plunderers vociferously. The three officers manifested the utmost indifference. While witnessing these deeds of destruction I accidentally heard that the ringleaders belonged to the laboring classes of Moscow, and had been sent to Kieff to get up the anti-Jewish agitation. This rumor has since been confirmed. It has been ascertained that that the same day they arrived from Moscow by the Kursk train taking a roundabout route to escape detection. The whole conspiracy against the Jews has been planned with great foresight by skilful and intelligent hands. Both the civil and military authorities showed the utmost respect for those who placed themselves at the head of the mob the day of the disturbances. A number of Jewish soldiers in the ranks were grossly ill treated by the crowd without the slightest effort being made by their officers or comrades to protect them. The following day I visited Demiatievka, where some friends of mine resided. On my way to that suburb I found twelve or fifteen men, apparently laborers, busy wrecking the Jews' school. The Superintendent of Police was standing in front of the building surrounded by a group of respectable looking people, among whom were several women. The schoolhouse was first pillaged and then burned. Being built of wood there was soon nothing left of it but smoking embers. When I reached the thickly populated part of the suburb I found that every single Jewish house had been destroyed by fire. On the Esplanade I saw several bodies lying motionless on the ground. Among them was a soldier belonging to the Engineers. I was informed that the peasants of the neighboring villages had largely participated in the sanguinary scene of the previous evening and had made off with a considerable amount of booty. At the brewery near the railway station the fury of the mob was such that the troops, it is said, at last fired upon them. The total amount of damage done may be estimated at from 4,000,000 to 5,000,000 rubles."

The Kieff periodical, the Zuria publishes a pitiable description of the riots. It is an appeal to the public to relieve the unfortunate Jews, and runs thus: "What I have witnessed to day defies all description; nor can I find words to express my feelings at the sight of thousands of poor people left without shelter and without means of subsistence—persecuted, hated and coolly treated. To think that in a civilized country, where there are laws and an organized State, it is possible that people should be reduced to such misery! Regardless of the bad weather I went to visit Parsenersk, where I was told that the Jews who had been plundered had found a refuge. Behind the Lavra Gate, in an enclosure that serves as an ammunition store for the arsenal, I beheld a truely heart rending sight. Packed together like ants in an anthill were more than one thousand eight hundred Jews, with their wives and children—many of them mere infants. They were clad in rags and barefooted. Many of them bore traces of ill treatment, and a number of them had bandaged heads. All were ghastly pale and terror stricken. As I approached them I saw a boy of ten dying in terrible agony. His mother sat by him, tearless, as if too deeply afflicted to weep. A little farther on I came across another mourning group. Then I penetrated into their midst. What I saw there was like a kind of hell full of troubled souls. It was a sight to unnerve the strongest man. There was hunger and cold, weeping and gnashing of teeth. A heart of stone would have melted, and I confess I could not withhold my tears. I was told that among these wretched beings awful scenes had been witnessed. Mothers had lost their children, and there had been fights and struggles for the limited space allotted to them. All this had taken place at night in bad weather. Many of them told me their tale of woe. One of them said: 'I had 20,000 rubles and a small farm. Now I have nothing but the rags on my back.' Another addressed me thus: 'My two brothers were killed in the wood last night, and I do not know what fate has befallen my son.' A third said, 'They wanted to hang my mother, but she escaped with the rope around her neck.' A fourth stated his case thus: 'They have robbed us of everything, even our clothes, leaving us naked as you see.' I must tell you that the first day these unhappy people had hardly anything to eat, but to-day they have been provided for. General Drentein's wife has taken the initiative of affording them relief."
