TUESDAY EVENING, JULY 19.

A Revolting Tragedy.

In the jail at Martinez, Contra Costa county, on the 4th of July, the officials of the prison found the dead body of Henry Grosser hanging to the door of the cell in which he had been confined, awaiting trial on a charge of murder. From all indications life had been extinct but a short time. The crime of which Grosser was accused, besides being the highest one known to the law, was supplemented by an almost incredible story of low scheming and deliberate preparation for the tragedy. The victim of the affair was one Christian Smith, a butcher of Oakland. About the 20th of last month his dead and bleeding body was seen in a cellar on the farm of Grosser, in Contra Costa county, and by the side of it, stretched out, with her clothing thrown over her head, her person exposed, and herself in a real or pretended faint, was Grosser's wife. The persons who viewed this revolting spectacle were neighbors of Grosser, called upon by him to come and witness the situation. When his wife appeared to have recovered her sensibilities the account which was given by them both was that Smith had followed the woman into the cellar with a vile proposal, with which he had previously annoyed her on various occasions; and when she positively renewed her refusal, he threw her down and attempted to outrage her. She screamed, and Grosser rushed to the scene, and to save and avenge his wife fired one or more pistol shots with fatal effect into the body of the butcher. For a time this story was believed, and no attempt was made to arrest Grosser, but in a few days suspicions of a terrible character were aroused, and he was secured and lodged in jail. The allegations against him were also directed against Mrs. Grosser, and were to the effect that the death of the unfortunate Smith was the finishing stroke of a bold conspiracy between the Grossers—man and wife. It was maintained, that a criminal intimacy has existed between Smith and the woman for several years, and that Grosser had, unknown to her paramour, secretely encouraged his wife in her unfaithful acts. During the long period Smith had furnished many large sums of money to the woman, which she devoted to the liquidation of a mortgage on her husband's farm. The financial encumbrance having been removed it was alleged that they concluded to live without Smith's attention and money, and so planned to kill him. On the fatal day he visited the farm, and it was supposed, was invited into the cellar by Mrs. Grosser, who immediately threw herself upon the ground and began screaming. The husband, who was believed to be lying in wait, rushed forward at the proper time and slew his wronged enemy.—San Francisco Chronicle
