FRENCH BAKERY.

THE undersigned begs to inform the Public that he has added to his establishment a BAKERY upon the French method; and that only competent French workmen will be employed. He hesitates not to say his bread is equal, if not superior, to any manufactured in the city, and guarantees that it will be as sweet and good as bread can be made, from the fact that no hog yeast will be used in its manufacture. A share of the public and private family patronage is earnestly solicited.

Hot Rolls every morning, at 5 o'clock. All descriptions of bread, and every variety of cake made to order.

Remember, if you want sweet and good bread call at P. O'CONNOR'S, corner of Union and Summer streets, opposite Odd Fellow's Hall.

The Public are respectfully informed that the well-known ICE CREAM SALOON of H. C. REEVES, (formerly of Nashville) will be re-opened Thursday the 8th of May, where Ice Cream, not to be excelled by any in the city, can be had. Call and judge for yourself. [ap 30-1m] P. O'CONNOR.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 18, 1862.

THE BATTLE OF WILLIAMSBURG.—There can be no question that the Rebel savages bayoneted our wounded. Lieut. BRUSH, of the New York Seventy-third, was seen to fall dead. He was shot through the heart. When his body was recovered, next day, it was wholly naked, and bayoneted.

All the wounded Zouaves, all having red shirts, who fell on the ground which the Rebels pushed us from, were found to have been bayoneted. They turned the pockets of their own dead inside out, and took off their shoes and stockings.

In the rifle-pit in front of the Fifth Michigan, sixty-three dead Rebels were found, every one killed by the bayonet.

Heintzelman flew everywhere among the New Jersey and other troops, who gave indications of backing out of the fight. He bawled himself hoarse, and stiffened the arm wounded at Bull Run, in ordering, coaxing, encouraging, beckoning and waving the outnumbered men into their ranks again. To infuse enthusiasm into them, he wandered around to find a band of music. He saw three in a group, and ordered them to play Yankee Doodle in force! The men, professional in the face of defeat and death, said that they had not the requisite number of instruments to do justice to all the notes of the tune!! The General then hurried around for more—found a part of another band—united them to the professional three, and electrified the worn out infantry with the "Star-Spangled Banner," "Yankee Doodle," and "Gem of the Ocean." The effect was that of war magic. It is in the small things as well as the great that the true commander is known.

Between Fort No. 1 and Fort Page, and half a mile distant from Fort No. 2, we come in sight of the first dead man that we have yet seen. He lays a few feet to the right of us, with his right hand drawn upward across his face, and one leg thrown carelessly over the other, as though he had laid down for a few moments' sleep, instead of the death "sleep which knows no waking." Dismounting from our horses, we lift the man's arm from off his face, and there obtain a full view of his countenance.

A ball had penetrated his forehead, and passed out at the back of his head, staining the ground upon which his head rests with a pool of blood. He is a young man, apparently about twenty-two years of age, of small stature, and with light blue eyes, which now look out upon us with a dull leaden stare that is hideous to contemplate. He is clad in a pair of pants of a dirty white color, and wears a coarse blue check shirt. His cap lies by the side of him. All else, his musket, and his haversack, are gone. He died, apparently, just where he fell, and, it would seem, almost without a struggle. Again mounting, we passed on, and when within a few hundred yards of Fort No. 2, a crowd of men standing near a rickety old stable on the right of us, attracted our attention. Here we found a number of men engaged in burying the dead bodies of the Rebel soldiers, who are lying in all directions around them. In the immediate vicinity of some of these graves are the bodies of the dead soldiers, all cold and stiff, and covered with mud.

The grave-diggers pause a moment as we ride up. We salute them, and they commence to inspect the dead Rebels. One of the diggers, noticing our badges, ventures the remark: "Gen. Hancock has been among the Rebels, you see, sir." "Were these race shots by the soldiers of Hancock's brigade?" we ask. "Well, I should think so," was the response. "You'll take the throughs to assume" (thus you'll find that the ball has taken in the brain, or breast, that the men of Mr. Macyelmacth are shown to possess) "Gen. Union's fire was on for which I would make a bet." [illegible] side of a fence dividing a wheat field from some meadow ground. It was the crouching position in which he lay that attracted our attention, and on approaching him we found that the man had been shot in the forehead by a musket ball, while in the act of taking aim at one of our own soldiers. His left hand was yet clasped, as though in the act of drawing the trigger. At this instant the death shot penetrated his brain, and dropping his musket at his side, he fell to the ground and instantly expired.

Pencil Sketches of the Union Convention.

Col. J. S. WALLACE, the able corresponding editor of the Louisville Journal in a very excellent report of the proceedings of the late Convention in this city, gives the following sketches of the material of that body:

The most important day in the history of Tennessee has brought the most gladdening sight to every lover of his country. The Capitol has been crowded with thousands representing all former diversities of political opinions, and nearly every section of the State. I have seen around me men who have suffered in bonds and endured persecution and confiscation of property rather than forswear their allegiance to the Government of their fathers, or join the traitors who have conspired for its overthrow; men who have been driven from their homes and hunted like wild beasts because they were loyal, and believed that secession was no remedy for fancied or exaggerated wrongs, but an aggravation of every evil which could befall our nation. Tennessee has to-day spoken in such trumpet tones that the shade of Andrew Jackson may hover over the State of his love and look down upon it with approval. The meeting, which has set the Union pulse throbbing so ardently, was called by the best, the wisest, the most beloved and experienced of Tennessee's statesmen—who have long enjoyed the public confidence, and in whose united counsels there is strength. Leading in the call, and most fitly selected to preside over the deliberations, was William B. Campbell, the last Whig Governor of Tennessee, a man whose purity of life has endeared him to all classes, and who has, from the first breaking out of the rebellion, been "as firm as Alisa rock" in his devoted attachment to the Union. Thrice has he been offered a General's command in the Confederate army, "and thrice did he refuse." He has done honor to his Scotch ancestry and to the teachings of his patriotic mother. She has watched with great solicitude the temptations thrown in the way of her son, and when she saw how good men all around her were falling from their loyalty, and asked herself whether William could be better than other men, has kneeled in prayer to God to give him strength to resist the importunities. No words chronicled on the page of history have more of the Spartan mother than those which this noble lady uttered when he did resist. She said, "I was proud of you, my son, when you fought so gallantly in Mexico, and I was proud of you when your fellow-citizens, as a mark of their confidence and high appreciation, elected you their Governor, but never was I so proud of you as when you refused to fight against your country!" Such women make man patriots. "Long the mother of Washington" is the proudest memorial ever inscribed on a tomb, and I feel just filled to saying that the mother of William B. Campbell will always be held in like affectionate regard and veneration by every loyal Tennessean.

The call of Mr. Lincoln upon the Andrew Johnson, a man who has served his State in every capacity, with his services culminated in the proud position of the representative of her sovereignty in the Senate of the United States, and when it was sought to drive Tennessee back to her allegiance by kindness, or to compel her adherence to her national duties by enforcing the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws. He has thus far executed his delicate task with consummate judgment, and from the fires of rancorous calumny and the furnaces of heated detraction, he has come out undefiled, like pure gold. When he shall have accomplished his mission, he will secure the gratitude of all men, and he himself will enjoy the proud consciousness of having fearlessly discharged his duty. [illegible] Tennessee too, has put the rebellion and secession [illegible] to the Union [illegible] and Johnson [illegible] made the splendid speech [illegible] of the Union [illegible] has shown [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
