THE CANTON MAIL.

Emmett L. Ross & Co., Proprietors.

"For forms of government let fools contest;
Whatever's best administered is best."

Terms:—$3 00 a Year.

VOLUME X. CANTON, MISSISSIPPI, JANUARY 2, 1875. NUMBER 26.

ADVERTISING RATES.

One square, ten lines, one insertion	$1 50
Each subsequent insertion	75
Cards of one square one year	15 00
Cards of two squares one year	25 00
One-fifth of a column one year	35 00
One-fourth of a column one year	45 00
One-third of a column one year	55 00
One half column one year	80 00
One column one year	150 00

Notices in local columns inserted for 20 cents per line for each insertion.

No proof of publication of legal advertisements will be made until our fee is settled.

Announcing candidates for state and district offices, $15; and for county offices, $10.

Marriages and deaths published free. Obituaries charged as advertisements.

CANTON MAIL.

Saturday Morning,

EMMETT L. ROSS.

Street, near Postoffice.

SUBSCRIPTION.

In advance.....$3.00
If not in advance.....3.50
In advance.....1.50

...AM CHARLEY SANG.

...BY EUGENE FIELD.

...night-wind sang
...no one knew;
...as they closer drew,
...is chewing the black night
...
...jest then blew,"
...nd sang
...knew;
...hearth below,
...ly snow,
...in the chimney."

...-wind sang
...one knew;
...mulled, for he
...a child—all three,
...own harmonic,
...er in the chimney."

...LAMBERT.

...ish Story of the Saver of ...ive Score Lives.

...RO AND MARTYR.

...ade, who wrote what fol... New York Tribune, gives ... voucher for the truthful... story in every part:

...gow Times of October 2, ... a brief description of a ... drowning in the Clyde. ... score of people on the bank, ... had the courage to plunge ... him until an elderly man, ...bert, appeared, who was a ...mmer and diver, and had ... than forty lives in that very ... man was stone blind, and a ... his granddaughter, was lead... the hand. But blindness ... the old man no obstacle to ...ing to save the child, and he ... plunged into the river had ...ddaughter, with a girl's af... ...ng round his knees and ... him not to go. This caused ... when there was no longer a ...ose. The boy sank for the ... deep grass from the spec... the sad end, and the poor ...ent home, flinging his arms ...pair and crying like a child. ...er then went on to enumer... ...tant exploits of this very ...bert before he lost his sight. ... winter he had plunged ...ed water on one and two ... great peril to his life; for ...mer is a dead man if a ...son clutches him and crip... And what was his reward? ...volent courage he was ...d, through so many imer... ...heated body in icy water. ...was a real hero for the nov... ...ssuming Hamlet's was the ...; it was military cour... ...trumpets to stir it; no ar... ...ist enthusiasm; often no ... And so the novelist for ten ... was going—going—going ...visit James Lambert. At ... to Glasgow and made in... ...mes Lambert. He asked ... all the waiters, and every ... the city. Not one soul ... of Lambert or his ex... ...e concluded that the poor ...me to a better world. He ...d went to police headquar... ...tioned the Scottish chief, ...put a detective of the Her... ...type to look up James Lam... ...bert.

...THE DEMO'S HOME.

...ley the detective came to ... and knocked and that the ...d Living at No. 36 Leith ..., a suburb of Glasgow. ... accordingly repaired, and ... the door, a woman's voice ...in," and he entered. An ... sat before the window, a ... sat all in a heap on the ... the fire; and in front of ... a gray-headed man, with ...ness, evidently blind. This ... Lambert, and having been ... his visitor to relate some of ...ess in life-saving, the old ... his story, telling in his fine ...e how, when he was but ...rs old, he rescued from ... an awful fat man," a baker. ...rible tussle with the drown... who held him tight to his ... carried his rescuer down with ... finally landed the baker, ... accomplished this he ...y from exhaustion. When ... himself the baker had put ...e and gone away without ...nd to his preserver. Two ...w the brave rescue gave him ...lities, however, and thus com... ...ried his rescuer down with ... for the scolding he got ...ed him for the scolding he got ...m his mother when he got home for ...ing his clothes.

...Lambert, duly questioned, then re... ...d how a personal friend of his had ...ome subject with the cramp in the mid... ...of the Clyde. He had sunk for the ... Lambert dived for him and ...ught him up from the bottom and ...ed him ashore.

...The next case was that of an old ...herman who had overbalanced ...herself and gone in head first. Lam... ...ert lifted her "puir auld gray head" ...out of the water and brought her ...shore. She offered him her wash-tub, ...which was all she had, but Lambert re... ...fused it and gave her a shilling and ...bade her good-bye.

REAL ROMANCE.

Mr. Reid continues his narrative:

After one or two savings that would have gained a man a medal in the south, had go for nothing in this man's career, and would elevate the more colored in books, Lambert prefaced a ce... ...tainly startling one into his mind. "By this time, sir," said he, "I was ...ave growling about day and night for ...

"Tell the truth, James. You had the ...ve of an artist. You wanted them to fall in, that you might pull them out, and show your dexterity."

"Ye know me wear than I am, ha! ha! Ye know, but ye ken, in those ...ays, folk mas ne sae acquainted in ...ing, and accidents was mair com... ...; and sir, if such a thing was to be, ...I would like to be there and save 'em. ...Oh, the sweetness o't!—the sweetness ...o't!"

"I mind every morning between ...three and four, and took a walk; it was ...a kind o' my natur, and the river was ...by the first place I ran to. Aweel, ...sir, it was a mild light, I heard ...high words, and there was a lass fleicht ...fear on a bed, and chairging him wi' ...bosie' her sake; an' presently she runs ...away skirling, and flings hersel' into ...the river. The lad he just turns on his ...heel and takes awa'."

I expressed my surprise and horror—no my, it is not what terms.

"Ye," replied loftily, "My dear sirr, ...ken this?—there have been men in ...the same men, that were little mair ...than ...bosoms."

I sought ...

"Twas no for sport neither. The ...lass knew the water, and ran straight to ...the deepest part, opposite Nelson's ...monument, where her claes buoyed her up, ...and I got my cont easy enough. She was ...as safe as a moment, when in she flees ...again, the daft hizzy. Noo the water ...mainly made their sort o' lasses, and ...recently them to terree firmee. But ...she was a daftie, she was just a woman ...that wanted to die. So I went in again, ...and lammed her a' the time I was pulling her out. 'Hae ye a quarrel wi' him ...that made ye, ye daft crummer,' says I; ...and I held her on the bank fleet' but if ...she was strong in the water, she was ...stronger on land wi' her daftness, and ...she flung off, and in again. 'Vera ...weel, my lady,' says I. 'Sae, d'ye ken ...what I did noo?'

"No."

"I just clouted her. I pit her head ...under water, and keepit there till I made her taste the bitterness o' dethe, for her gude, ye ken. Hech, sirr, but it sickened her o' you game. She brought up a quart o' Clyde, and then she lay and rolled a bit and pu'd the grass and then she sat up quiet as a lamb, and I stood sentinel over her leddyship, and my claes a drippin'. By this time, and wheen folk cam' aboot to see, all doosna the lad that was wi' her stey forrud and complain to me. 'Ye'd lift to do to interfere,' says he; 'she was wi' me; she was na wi' you.' 'What,' says I, 'd'ye begroodge the lass her life? 'Not I,' says he; 'but y' had no need medlie; what's your business?' Sae gied him his answer. Says I, 'Ye have taen her character, and turned her on the maircy of the world, and noo's a' your vexation that ye could na bide of her in the Clyde. But she shall live you, ye blackguard,' says I 'Lease Gude.' So then he challenged me to fight. But as I made ready to take off my coat, a fine lad steps forrit and lays his hand on my arm. 'Ye'll no fit ye Score Lives.' 'Na, sir,' says Lambert, there is a laddie in the water."

Up ran James Lambert, but the boy had sunk; a bystander directed him to the place; but it is not so easy to mark the exact spot where a body has disappeared in the water; and James Lambert dived twice and came up without the child. He dived a third time, and groped along the bottom. He was down so long that the cry got up that he was drowned, too. Otherwise nobody had James Lambert drown. They had known him to cross the Clyde, under the water, from bank to bank. Some time having elapsed since the first alarm, people had poured across the green and down the banks, and there was quite a crowd there murmuring and gazing, when up came James Lambert, panting, with the child in his arms.

There was a roar of exultation at the sight, but James Lambert did not hear it, and did not see the crowd. (Take note of that fact.) His whole soul was in the lovely boy, that lay white and inanimate in his arms. He ran into the house uttering cries of concern.

"But, when I got him in the house, he opens an eye on me—like a bonny blue bead it was. Eh! I was happy; I gied the bonny bairn a kiss and hands him to the wife, and orders her to the fire wi' him. Then I'm going out, when a' of a sooden I finds I hae na a steek on me, and twa hundred folk about the doors. Weel, ye believe it, wi' the great excitement, I never knew I was nakit, till I saw the folk, and bethought me. I rins back again, and at the stair-foot there's a bundle o' linen. 'I was na lang happing myself,' I can tell ye, and oot I opens, as bold as brass, in the wife's apron and a muckle sheet. The sight of me made the lasses scarit and skirl, for I was like a crop just poppit oot o' the grave. I went for my clothes and—they were away. My blnid gat up at that, and I checkit them sair. 'Hech,' says I, 'ye maunn be a cauld-hairted set o' thieves,' says I, 'to tak' my very claes, when I was doing a mon's pairt.' Bymby, I sees a young leddy in a silk gown, wagging on me, and she points to a hedge near by. So I went, and there was my claes. She had put them aside for me, ye ken, and keepit her ee on them. Wasna that thouchtful o' her, noo?"

"It was, indeed."

"Aweel, sirr, I got my things on the hedge, an' tied up the wife's bundle, and cam' forrit; and by this time the folk was dispairsed like. But the same young leddy was walking to the fra, with her seen room, reflecking like. She wagged on me, and I came to her. So she sakit me who I was, and I tell't her I was a cotton-spinnee, and they caed me James Labert. So then she lookit at me full, and says she, 'James, are you marred?' 'Oh, yes, ma'am,' says I, 'this three years.' So she lokit at me all over, in a vara curious way; and she says, saftly, 'James—it is—a—great—pity—yere—married—for yere a vara—gallant—man.' So ye see, sirr, I could has had a young leddy—for her ee tell't me mair nor her words—if I had na had the wife. But then I'd no has had the wife. So it comes a' to the same thing."

I started at him with surprise, for to me it did not seem quite the same thing to marry high sympathy, swift intelligence, and plenty of money, and to marry poverty, pius groveling mediocrity. However, it was not for me to satirize conjugal affection and its amiable delusions. But I proposed the young lady's health, and we drank it cordially.

UNDER THE ICE.

By this time I concluded I have so spoiled the readers of James Lambert, that they will care for no passage of his extraordinary career, that does not offer some new features. So I go from water to double peril of ice and water at the freezing point.

"It was a hard winter; and I had charge o' the gentlemen belonging to the skating club. So I had to go to Hugginfield loch. But I was clean wastit there. I was armed wi' ladders an' ropes, and corks. Mon, ony fule can stand and fling gear till a drooning body. And I gat an awin' affront intil the bargain; they cast it in my teeth that I was partial, and save the rich afore the poor. Noo I let nasebody droon, but my bargain was with the club to save them first, so behooved to keep the contract. Aweel, then, I did nae execution there worth speaking o'; the thing I'm coming tae was at the bend of the Clyde they ca' the peat bog.' A number was skating on the river, and the ice began to heave an' shake wi' the high tide. So I chased all the boys aff wi' my belt, and warned the men; but some folk winna be warned by me. The ice breaks under a laboring man, and in he goes, and the tide sucked him under in a moment. I ran to the place as fast as I could and under the ice after him. Aweel, I soomed, and soomed, and did nae catch him, till I had nae chance to come back alive, if I did na turn. But just as I turned my for him,' says he; 'an' ye've done your work,' says he, 'and this is mine.' So at it they went, and t'other still up and fought for about five minutes. But oh! he napped it. My lad just shed him. Gied him twa black een, and at the hinder end laid him sprawl and smothered i' bluid."

"But the woman?"

"She was na a woman. She was but a lassie, about nineteen."

"Little fool! and thought she was ruined for life—when all her life was before her."

"Ye may say that, sirr; why that very year wasna she married to a great tradesman? I often saw her after she was married; but she wadna speak to me. She couldna look me straight i' the face. She'd say 'Gude morning,' though—when she couldna get by it. 'Ungrateful little brute!'

"Na, na; it was an ingratitude it was just shame. Aweel, she ne'er ran fra' me noo; for I canna see, nor ony of those I hae saved."

This made me gulp a bit, and, while I had done, I said, "She measured in by her small self. She would have sure to blab, in such a case, so I thought you would."

"Aweel, then," said he, "she mistaken; for I mean tell ye that a mischief-maker let on something other about it to her man, and he uneasy, and came and asked me if 'twas true I had taken his wife out o' water. 'Ay,' said I, 'and twarree more.' 'What had she to do i' the water?' he. 'That's her business,' says I; 'na was to tak' her oot.' He questioned had she been drinking. 'Like enemy,' says I, 'but I couldna say.' He questioned me, and questioned me; but put the collar on, ye ken. I behooved to clear the wife a' I could. I didna neither; but I was afflicted wi' a soon oblescion o' sma' partoecular, how haw! I didna think muckle o' ... carle. He had a rare gude wife; the a' said so, and whaur was the sense him diving into her past life, to stir ... mud?"

HOW LAMBERT MISSED A CHANCE.

Passing over an easy job or two, a few melancholy cases, in which he dived and groped the river, and restored dead bodies to their friends, I have come now to a passage, which but the truth I should hesitate to relate exactly as he told it to me; but, if I were to yield to squeamishness and slur it, a chapter of human nature, revealed to me, would by me have been carried to my grave and hidden from the scholars of other ages and nations.

Thus, then, it was—James Lambert was bathing in the Clyde one evening at the hour when it was allowed at that epoch.

Suddenly, Mrs. Cooper, that kept the Society's house, cried to him over the window: "Sir, for God's sake, Lambert, there is a laddie in the water."

Up ran James Lambert, but the boy had sunk; a bystander directed him to the place; but it is not so easy to mark the exact spot where a body has disappeared in the water; and James Lambert dived twice and came up without the child. He dived a third time, and groped along the bottom. He was down so long that the cry got up that he was drowned, too. Otherwise nobody had James Lambert drown. They had known him to cross the Clyde, under the water, from bank to bank. Some time having elapsed since the first alarm, people had poured across the green and down the banks, and there was quite a crowd there murmuring and gazing, when up came James Lambert, panting, with the child in his arms.

There was a roar of exultation at the sight, but James Lambert did not hear it, and did not see the crowd. (Take note of that fact.) His whole soul was in the lovely boy, that lay white and inanimate in his arms. He ran into the house uttering cries of concern.

"But, when I got him in the house, he opens an eye on me—like a bonny blue bead it was. Eh! I was happy; I gied the bonny bairn a kiss and hands him to the wife, and orders her to the fire wi' him. Then I'm going out, when a' of a sooden I finds I hae na a steek on me, and twa hundred folk about the doors. Weel, ye believe it, wi' the great excitement, I never knew I was nakit, till I saw the folk, and bethought me. I rins back again, and at the stair-foot there's a bundle o' linen. 'I was na lang happing myself,' I can tell ye, and oot I opens, as bold as brass, in the wife's apron and a muckle sheet. The sight of me made the lasses scarit and skirl, for I was like a crop just poppit oot o' the grave. I went for my clothes and—they were away. My blnid gat up at that, and I checkit them sair. 'Hech,' says I, 'ye maunn be a cauld-hairted set o' thieves,' says I, 'to tak' my very claes, when I was doing a mon's pairt.' Bymby, I sees a young leddy in a silk gown, wagging on me, and she points to a hedge near by. So I went, and there was my claes. She had put them aside for me, ye ken, and keepit her ee on them. Wasna that thouchtful o' her, noo?"

"It was, indeed."

"Aweel, sirr, I got my things on the hedge, an' tied up the wife's bundle, and cam' forrit; and by this time the folk was dispairsed like. But the same young leddy was walking to the fra, with her seen room, reflecking like. She wagged on me, and I came to her. So she sakit me who I was, and I tell't her I was a cotton-spinnee, and they caed me James Labert. So then she lookit at me full, and says she, 'James, are you marred?' 'Oh, yes, ma'am,' says I, 'this three years.' So she lokit at me all over, in a vara curious way; and she says, saftly, 'James—it is—a—great—pity—yere—married—for yere a vara—gallant—man.' So ye see, sirr, I could has had a young leddy—for her ee tell't me mair nor her words—if I had na had the wife. But then I'd no has had the wife. So it comes a' to the same thing."

I started at him with surprise, for to me it did not seem quite the same thing to marry high sympathy, swift intelligence, and plenty of money, and to marry poverty, pius groveling mediocrity. However, it was not for me to satirize conjugal affection and its amiable delusions. But I proposed the young lady's health, and we drank it cordially.

UNDER THE ICE.

By this time I concluded I have so spoiled the readers of James Lambert, that they will care for no passage of his extraordinary career, that does not offer some new features. So I go from water to double peril of ice and water at the freezing point.

"It was a hard winter; and I had charge o' the gentlemen belonging to the skating club. So I had to go to Hugginfield loch. But I was clean wastit there. I was armed wi' ladders an' ropes, and corks. Mon, ony fule can stand and fling gear till a drooning body. And I gat an awin' affront intil the bargain; they cast it in my teeth that I was partial, and save the rich afore the poor. Noo I let nasebody droon, but my bargain was with the club to save them first, so behooved to keep the contract. Aweel, then, I did nae execution there worth speaking o'; the thing I'm coming tae was at the bend of the Clyde they ca' the peat bog.' A number was skating on the river, and the ice began to heave an' shake wi' the high tide. So I chased all the boys aff wi' my belt, and warned the men; but some folk winna be warned by me. The ice breaks under a laboring man, and in he goes, and the tide sucked him under in a moment. I ran to the place as fast as I could and under the ice after him. Aweel, I soomed, and soomed, and did nae catch him, till I had nae chance to come back alive, if I did na turn. But just as I turned my for him,' says he; 'an' ye've done your work,' says he, 'and this is mine.' So at it they went, and t'other still up and fought for about five minutes. But oh! he napped it. My lad just shed him. Gied him twa black een, and at the hinder end laid him sprawl and smothered i' bluid."

"But the woman?"

"She was na a woman. She was but a lassie, about nineteen."

"Little fool! and thought she was ruined for life—when all her life was before her."

"Ye may say that, sirr; why that very year wasna she married to a great tradesman? I often saw her after she was married; but she wadna speak to me. She couldna look me straight i' the face. She'd say 'Gude morning,' though—when she couldna get by it. 'Ungrateful little brute!'

"Na, na; it was an ingratitude it was just shame. Aweel, she ne'er ran fra' me noo; for I canna see, nor ony of those I hae saved."

This made me gulp a bit, and, while I had done, I said, "She measured in by her small self. She would have sure to blab, in such a case, so I thought you would."

"Aweel, then," said he, "she mistaken; for I mean tell ye that a mischief-maker let on something other about it to her man, and he uneasy, and came and asked me if 'twas true I had taken his wife out o' water. 'Ay,' said I, 'and twarree more.' 'What had she to do i' the water?' he. 'That's her business,' says I; 'na was to tak' her oot.' He questioned had she been drinking. 'Like enemy,' says I, 'but I couldna say.' He questioned me, and questioned me; but put the collar on, ye ken. I behooved to clear the wife a' I could. I didna neither; but I was afflicted wi' a soon oblescion o' sma' partoecular, how haw! I didna think muckle o' ... carle. He had a rare gude wife; the a' said so, and whaur was the sense ...