ON THE FIELD OF HONOR.

HOW FASHIONABLE FRENCH DUELS ARE FOUGHT.

Recent Boulangist Encounters—One of Rochefort's Characteristic Fights and the First of Mermeix's Many Challenges.

At last the duel between M. Rochefort and M. Thiebaud, the ex-Boulangist deputy, has been fought, says a Paris correspondent of the Philadelphia Times. It took place on Saturday on Dutch territory. After the futile attempt to cross swords on the day before utmost secrecy as to their plans was necessary in order to baffle not only the gendarmes of Belgium and Holland, who appear to have been rather sleepy, but also the Belgian and foreign press correspondents, on whom the police mainly relied for information. M. Rochefort left Ghent on Friday night with his seconds. All traveled by the same train, but in different carriages. They alighted at St. Nicolas, between Ghent and Antwerp, spending the night at the Hotel des Quatre Sceaux. The three guests were up at dawn, and, taking a four-wheeler, soon reached the Dutch border, which in this, as in many other parts, is a low-lying, marshy land, yielding under the foot, and abounding in pitfalls and quagmires. The choice of the ground for this reason was a matter of difficulty.

M. Thiebaud and his two seconds arrived about 8 o'clock at the Belgian station of La Clinge and walked across the frontier. The parties found at length a convenient site in a lonely alley sheltered from the sun by a wall. The principals cast a hurried look around them. Not a cockage was on the horizon, so, while the doctors were syringing the swords to render them antiseptic, they hurriedly threw off their coats and waistcoats. They are now sword in hand; the seconds cry, "Go!" and the fight begins.

M. Rochefort, according to his usual tactics, rushes upon his adversary impetuously; the latter retreats one step; a rustling sound of swords is heard. M. Rochefort rushes again, and both men are entangled breast to breast. M. Thiebaud received a thrust in the thigh, a cut on the cheek, and a violent flat blow across the forehead. The fight was stopped, and M. Thiebaud, who was not seriously hurt, drove back to St. Nicolas in M. Rochefort's carriage, attended by the doctors. The two adversaries met again in the railway station, and shook hands. "I hope it is not serious," said M. Rochefort, and he added: "It was not you I alluded to in my article, upon my honor."

There was a large crowd on the platform, and M. Rochefort was the object of a sort of friendly manifestation. In Sunday's Intransigeant he gives a characteristic account of the affair. "My perigrinations," he says, "although over much smaller distances than those of M. Carnot, have been infinitely more fertile in incidents. The correspondents of papers of every color have chased us for three days, and, thanks to them, Belgium and Holland mobilized their gendarmerie in our honor. A price has been put upon us at the rate of 50 francs a head, and six mounted police, four on foot and a swarm of detectives were up the whole of last night. While they were beating time on the same spot, however, we were polishing up our swords farther along at La Clinge. Reporters were swarming everywhere. I crossed them on my staircase. Vaughan, one of the seconds, found one in his bed, and they took away our carriages by main force in a village half Dutch, half Belgian. We ask for a carriage to carry us whither duty called us. 'There is only one,' said the innkeeper, 'and it has been secured by reporters; but I can get from the milk woman next door a cart with six dogs who will run as fast as the village mare.' This would have made us a butt for life-long ridicule. The carriage came at last, however, our tormenters having failed to secure it. The gendarmes made no secret of their source of information. One of them stopping our carriage yesterday said: 'I know what you are up to. I have found out from the papers.' Under these circumstances affairs of honor become affairs of legs. While defending yourself in front you are under the apprehension of being sandwiched between a sword and a bayonet."

M. Johnson, the London correspondent of the Paris Figaro, is one of the reporters to whom M. Rochefort refers as running after him. M. Johnson, who writes from Ghent on the 5th instant, had as much difficulty in attending this notable encounter as had the recorders of the so-called fight between Smith and Slavin at Bruges. In the first place, he left Ostend at 8:40 in the morning, and did not get to Ghent till past midnight. About midday following he arrived at Selzacte, on the Dutch frontier, where the duel was to take place; but he did not get there without the necessity of expelling two of his journalistic conferees from his carriage, as he himself describes it, sans facons. The first act in the duel took place here, and consisted of M. Rochefort divesting himself of his coat. M. Thiebaud, being a little more leisurely, allowed a Dutch gendarme to come up, who said, although he was much out of breath: "Here, you can't do this sort of thing here."

The majesty of the law being recognized, the parties returned their swords to their scabbards, and adjourned across the frontier to finish out the farce; but here, as M. Johnson narrates, the most absurd incident occurred. The adventure had been noised abroad, and when the Dutch police left the chase it was taken up by the Belgians, who threatened to lock up the entire party. Under these distressing circumstances the duel had to be adjourned till Saturday.

The duels and the revelations continue to supply Paris with daily matter for excitement and help to make the dull season one of the gayest ever remembered. M. Mermeix's first duel, which took place last evening, was attended with an unpleasant hitch, which will offer an excuse to those who have accepted his challenges to withdraw from their engagements with honor. During the first pass of arms between him and M. Labruyere, one of M. Mermeix's seconds cried out, mistakenly: "M. Labruyere, you are touched," upon which another second gave the order to drop swords. M. Labruyere immediately dropped his sword, when his adversary, with a lunge forward, wounded him rather deeply in the hand. "Sir," exclaimed M. Labruyere, "you have wounded a man off his guard after orders to stop. You are a scoundrel."

An angry discussion arose among the seconds, and it seemed as if the affair would degenerate into a six-cornered duel. M. Mermeix explained, which was undoubtedly the case, that he had acted quite unintentionally, having heard the order when too late to arrest his movement. M. Labruyere, however, only replied by a scowl and a shrug of the shoulders, and, turning to M. Mayer Levy, remarked bitterly that he was the cause of the mischief. He then insisted on taking up the swords again, but the witnesses would not allow this. The adversaries, with their backs turned to one another, put on their coats. M. Mermeix confused at his mishap, M. Labruyere nervous from indignation, real or fictitious. The latter, looking round at M. Mermeix over his shoulder, taunted him, and finished by saying that the affair was only postponed. He then left the ground, smarting with his wound, and with the reflection that honor, after all, was not satified.

The official account of the duel states that, t order to stop being given, M. Labruyere was wounded almost the same instant. One of M. Mermeix's projected duels (that with the deputy, M. Castelin) will not take place. M. Castelin had previously objected to fight with M. Mermeix on various grounds, but M. Fortalis, a Deputy, to whom both parties had appealed as umpire, ruled against him. His seconds, however, to-day learning the result of the Labruyere duel, called on the latter, who declared upon his honor that M. Mermeix had wounded him wilfully and in a cowardly manner while off his guard. The seconds say that in consequence of this M. Mermeix is beneath fighting with. M. Castelin, without troubling to hear M. Mermeix's account of the accident, adopts this view, but begs them to hold themsalves at his disposal in case of need, because he is determined not to tolerate any commentary upon his decision from any quarter. It is probable that several of the parties will now decline to meet M. Mermeix, some from honorable scruples, others because they have now what is, with a strain, a plausible excuse for avoiding a first-rate swordsman. M. Millevoye, one of the deputies with whom the author of the revelations wanted to fight, has left town on a shooting expedition. M. Fouquier, another of his intended vis-a-vis, has decided to act according to circumstances, a phrase which allows of any interpretation.

THE PLANETS IN OCTOBER.

Some Information That Will Impart Interest to a Study of the Heavens.

Venus is evening star. Our celestial neighbor is seen through the month in her most bewitching aspect, for she reaches her period of greatest brilliancy on the 29th at 8 A. M. She is then about midway between greatest elongation and inferior conjunction, reaching the latter epoch in her course in thirty-six days. Her increasing diameter as she approaches the earth, before this time, has more than balanced the lessening portion of her illumined disk, and her lustre has constantly increased. The conditions are reversed after this time. Her great increase in diameter fails to balance the light of the rapidly waning crescent, the phase which Venus then takes on, and her lustre decreases. The moment after her greatest elongation she turns toward the sun, Venus comes very near Antares in her October path. The planet and the star are in conjunction on the 17th at 3h 25m P. M., when Venus is only 20' south of the bright red star that during the summer has been the companion of Mars.

s Mercury is morning star. He reaches his greatest western elongation on the 15th at 1h A. M., being 18 degrees and 10 minutes west of the sun. He is then in good position to be picked out by the unaided eye, rising an hour and a half before the sun. Observers will find him in the east, about 8 degrees north of the sunrise point. It is the third and last time during the year when his position in the heavens is such that he is visible to the naked eye as morning star.

Uranus is evening star until the 20th, when he becomes morning star. He is in conjunction with the sun on the 20th at 7h. 39m. A. M., when, passing to the sun's western side, he commences his course as morning star. On his way westward from the sun he meets Mercury retracing his steps toward the sun. The planets are in conjunction on the 31st at 1h. 48m. P. M., Uranus being 1 degree 4 minutes south.

Jupiter is evening star. The planet which was so beautiful an object during the starlit nights of September will hold his court with slightly diminished lustre during the nights of October, under conditions, it is to be hoped, more favorable to the observer. An interesting event occurs in his course. He is in quadrature with the sun on the 26th at 9h P. M., being then 90 degrees east of the sun, evenly poised between opposition and conjunction. He is on the meridian then about midnight, and in fine position for telescopic observation, especially in regard to the eclipses of his satellites.

Mars is evening star. He makes his way during the month among the smallestars of Sagittarius. Observers will note two points in his course, his lessening size and fading light, and his approach to Jupiter, only about nine degrees intervening between them on the last of the month.

Saturn is morning star. The beautiful planet now graces the morning sky, rising when the month closes four hours before the sun. Observers willing to take the trouble will find him in the small hours in the morning on the first of the month thirty degrees east of Regulus, with whom he kept such close companionship last year, and whom he now leaves as he pursues his eastward course.

Venus, Mars, and Jupiter are evening stars at the close of the month. Neptune, Saturn, Uranus, and Mercury are morning stars.

The October moon falls on the 27th at 8h. 42m. P. M. She is in conjunction with Neptune on the 24 at 6h. 18m. P. M., being 46m. north. She is in conjunction with Saturn on the 19th at 6h. 58m. P. M., being 3 degrees 40 minutes north. The waning moon and the planet will make a charming picture on the eastern sky. The moon is in conjunction with Mercury on the 12th at 2h. 21m A. M., being 3 degrees 56 minutes north. She is in conjunction with Uranus on the 14th at 3h. 9m. A. M. She is in conjunction with Venus on the 17th at 7h. 51m. A. M., being 5 degrees, 41m. north. She makes a close conjunction with Mars on the 20th at 7h. 34m. A. M., being 33 minutes south. She passes near Jupiter on the 21st at 8h. 36m. A. M., being 3 degrees 5m. south. She is in conjunction with Neptune on the 30th at 2h. 59m. A. M., being 53m. north.

The moon contributes three occultations to the events of the month, not one of them being visible in this vicinity. She occults Neptune on the 24 at 6h. 10m. P. M., Washington mean time. The occultation is visible to all observers between the limiting parallels of 90 degrees and 15 degrees north latitude, who see the moon in her geocentric position, or as she appears when seen from the centre of the earth. The moon occults Mars on the 20th at 7h. 26m. A. M. The occultation will be visible to observers between the limiting parallels of 15 degrees and 87 degrees south, who sees the moon in her geocentric position. The moon occults Neptune for the second time during the month on the 30th at 2h. 51m. A. M. The observer must be between the limiting parallels of 80 degrees and 23 degrees north and see the moon in her geocentric position in order to behold the occultation.

The full moon next following the harvest moon is called the hunter's moon. Our satellite is still at a point in the ecliptic near enough to the sign Aries for her to make a small angle with the eastern horizon when rising, though larger than at the time of the harvest moon. As the harvest moon was supposed, in the days of old, to be a special interposition of Providence to help the husbandman in gathering the fruits of the earth, so the hunter's moon was considered as a special boon to the huntsmen in pursuit of their favorite sport. The October moon rises for three consecutive evenings after the full, with an average difference of thirty-seven minutes.—Providence Journal.

Activity in Business Circles—Democratic Outlook—A Pedestrian Tour for Girls.

REIDSVILLE, N. C., Oct. 6.—[Special.]—After five days of equinoctial rain, we have had several fair days, which has brought on renewed energy and activity in business circles.

The county Democratic candidates spoke here several days ago, and, as a good old Democratic farmer expressed it, "Gave the Rads the very devil." Ex-Governor Thomas J. Jarvis delivered an excellent discourse on the issues of the day. Friday a good crowd turned out to listen and to cheer the "old war-horse" of Democracy. There has been some kicking among the Alliance people against returning Senator Vance to Washington, on account of his views concerning the Sub-Treasury bill, but Mr. Jarvis convinced most of them that Vance's position was truly Democratic, and told them to by no means spare an effort to help send him back.

Last week an ex-sheriff of Haywood county, while crossing a track in the Western part of the State, was struck by a freight train, and he, with his horse, was instantly killed.

J. H. Walker & Co., whose large roller-flour mill was burned several days ago, have already began negotiations to rebuild larger than before. Such is the grit of our business men.

Captain A. H. A. Williams, Democratic candidate for Congress, and John M. Brower, present incumbent, Republican, will address the people here in a few days, but of course Williams will get him down in November.

Salem Female Academy has a custom of taking the senior class on some kind of excursion every year. This year they are debating whether to go on an extended Northern tour or a pedestrian tour to the Pilot Mountains. If they go to the Pilot they will have two cars to go along with them, so in case any of the girls break down they may board the train. They will walk ten miles a day, which will be good walking for a class of girls from fifteen to eighteen years of age.

This town has been literally overrun by leaf tobacco during the past week. Every warehouse was crowded, but the manufacturers and dealers found places to put it and money to pay for it, and sent the farmers home happy.

QUOTATIONS OF THE NEW YORK COTTON MARKET.

Situation of Tobacco at Richmond and Other Important Centres—Cotton and Farm Products—Peanut Quotations—Miscellaneous.

NEW YORK, Oct. 6.—Money closed at 6 per cent. Exchange closed steady; posted rates, 482½@485; actual rates, 481¾@482 for sixty days, and 487¼ for demand. Governments closed steady; currency 6's, 114 bid; 4's, coupons, 122½ bid; 4½'s, 104.

The stock market was extremely unsettled and nervous this morning although the volume of business was much larger than for several months past. The bears raided the market on every rally, and in this way succeeded in keeping values down. Prices at noon were ¼@2½ per cent. lower, the latter in Louisville and Nashville, which was quite freely sold. In the last half of the day money was stringent, the rate for call loans advancing to 7 per cent. This resulted in a decline of ¼ to ¾ per cent. by 2 o'clock, but at the close rates for money fell to 4 to 4½ per cent. The stock market rallied ½ to 1½ per cent., leaving the final figures irregularly changed, but in most cases ½ to 1 per cent. higher than on Saturday. Sales, 366,000.
