

From our London correspondent.

Nothing was comparable to the quiet magnanimity with which England bore the news of the unanimous annexation of Texas...

Although the negotiations conducted by the English and French ministers in Mexico, for the purpose of establishing a dependence of Texas...

The purport of this remark is plain. England has no disposition—in other words, cannot assist Mexico, and in consequence of this she must, therefore, needs rest contented with the affliction of annexation...

England avows now, most strenuously, that she had no idea of acquiring Texas; yet, with her avowed principle of assisting all possible means...

"The world," continues the Times newspaper, "views the annexation of Texas, if the whole history of the transaction from first to last be dispassionately surveyed...

spits of the outward frown. We have nothing to fear from any power of Europe, be it France, England, or Russia; and besides, these powers will never act in concert with one another.

England has good grace, and is altogether conservative in her politics. She is like the dog in the fable, who preached peace when he had lost his teeth.

France continues in her present prosperous state. Her wealthy people are increasing their wealth; whilst the poor (about two-thirds of the whole population) are hourly increasing in numbers.

Louis Philippe is trying to establish the glory of his house by his marriage with an heiress, who has determined on the marriage of Donna Isabella with a Gourg-Kohary, provided the Duke of Montpensier marries his sister Louisa.

The visit of the Queen of England to Germany (because she has not only visited the King of Prussia, but the King of Bavaria, the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, Baden, &c., besides numerous cities) is being received with great enthusiasm...

By that most essentially threaten the commercial and manufacturing supremacy of England. These southern states of Germany are opposed to the north, who are all more or less against the treaty with the United States...

It is said that the consumption of tobacco in Germany is not very considerable, and that the duty, which has been levied on it, is not very high.

Prussia, moreover, has but one eye in the affairs and management of the Zoll-Verain. As regards any measure that she may propose, it is easy for her to get the majority in the Zoll-Verain...

In 1814, the India trade was opened to the commerce of England generally. Prior to this period, the average produce amounted to 5,000,000 pounds.

The present duty in England is 1s. per pound. From her colonies it is free. None is considered the produce of her colonies that is not imported directly from thence.

churches as any other city with which I am acquainted. I could wish, however, to see more of the taste of Christopher Wren, and see the use of the Gothic style, which he had the good sense, with Luigi Jones, to discard as far as he could.

It seems to us, that if these powers had succeeded in their efforts to acknowledge the independence of Texas, their own previous acknowledgment of the same to the Rio Grande del Norte would, or ought, to have induced them to adhere to the same boundary in their intervention with Mexico.

Prussia, in 1813, to march upon Mexico, she possessed the right to do so, inasmuch as she had maintained her independence for years, and by force of arms, over the soil to the Rio Grande, in conclusion of our right, through her accession, to the same.

As I took occasion to allude to the culture and commercial importance of indigo, in my letter of yesterday, the 19th inst., after noticing our trade, commerce, &c., with China, I will beg leave to add a few lines on the subject of indigo.

My letter is becoming rather long. I may, if I have not already done so, add a few lines to it in my next letter, and add a few lines to it in my next letter, and add a few lines to it in my next letter.

THE "HOLY COAT"—A SECOND REFORMATION. The "Holy Coat" is represented to be the identical one in which our Saviour was apparelled, from the time of his birth to his death.

The Queen of the West sailed to-day for Liverpool. The ship Hindoo is in from Trieste, after 79 days' passage.
