HADLEY DISCUSSES MACHINE POLITICS

President of Yale Traces Development of Parties in Address at Charlottesville.

EVILS ARE CAUSE OF REVOLT

Distinguished Educator Delivers Barbour-Page Lectures at University.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.]

Charlottesville, Va., April 7.—President Arthur T. Hadley, of Yale University, discussed the development of party and machine politics in the United States last night in his opening lecture at the University of Virginia on the Barbour-Page foundation. To-night he considered certain problems involved in the popular revolt against machine control. To-morrow night he will close the series with a lecture on "The Organization of Public Opinion."

In the absence of Dean James M. Page, Professor William M. Thornton, dean of the engineering school, introduced Dr. Hadley to an audience in Madison Hall that filled every seat in the auditorium. Professor Thornton said that President Alderman had with difficulty been restrained from coming back to the university at this time in order to preside at the opening of this notable series of lectures, delivered by his distinguished friend. Professor Thornton added that this fact was a source of much gratification to President Alderman's friends, as indicating how completely he has won his fight for good health.

President Hadley threw much light upon many phases of the growth of political parties in the United States since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. Great as was the foresight and wisdom of the framers of the Constitution, he said, they failed to provide a means of satisfying a need that parties came to fill. This, however, was not surprising, for the need of primaries and platforms was unknown to them or to their predecessors in political thought anywhere in the world where democratic government had taken hold.

From the congressional caucus, through the "to the victor belongs the spoils" doctrine of Jackson, through the Civil War period, down to the prolonged sway of the Republican party, based upon the idea of a protective tariff, President Hadley traced party growth and the development of party machinery.

The evils of this state of affairs, and the way the people gradually came to revolt, were reserved for the lecture to-night.

President Hadley was taken on an automobile trip to Monticello yesterday afternoon. Last night he was the guest of honor at a dinner given by Professor and Mrs. C. Alphonso Smith at their home on the lawn. He was the luncheon guest to-day of Professor and Mrs. W. H. Heck.

Mrs. Edwin A. Alderman gave a large and beautifully appointed reception in honor of President Hadley at her home, on Carr's Hill, late this afternoon.
