Kissing and Yoking

A Washington reporter says Senator Elkins and Cole Younger met for the first time in thirty-one years in the cloakroom room of the senate. When they met the Senator from Missouri rushed across the floor and in some way drew the senator from his seat. He fell upon the latter's neck and wept. Tears ran down the cheeks of the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from West Virginia was also moved to tears. The story which passed current was that Younger had come to Washington to see Senator Elkins in the interest of his pardon. The story was that Younger had served his time. Cole was in the crowd. The story was that Younger had served his time in the state and for Elkins and Younger had grown up together. The Senator Elkins was also in the party. Younger is reported to have told the senator he came to see his old friend and associate. The war between the two had not alienated the hearts of the boys. Mr. Elkins is reported to have said to Younger: "Cole, Mr. Elkins, I am glad to see you." Younger said he was glad to see Elkins. Younger said he was on turning from seeing a girl dressed in his uniform. He threw himself into a half of the arms of his old friend. Younger said he was a good boy. Elkins said he was a good boy. Younger said he was a good boy. Elkins said he was a good boy. Younger said he was a good boy. Elkins said he was a good boy
