Would Send Tulsa Delegation to Carranza.

The following letter, while self-explanatory and fully covering the situation, portrays only this interesting town. Thad Harry Pender, as a boy in years of age, went into Mexico looking for a representative job and which he got, and did in those days write a story in itself, and a most dramatic one, entitles him to the serious and conscientious consideration of every man in the oil business.

He believes that there should be a delegation sent from Tulsa to interview Carranza, and cites the fact that a large delegation of San Antonio people recently returned from Mexico City, all shouting the glories of Mexico, and the great opportunities for trade extension in that direction.

Tulsa has the largest manufacturing concerns in the entire southwest, and is entitled to a share of Mexican trade, and should by all means look after her own interests, not depending in any way on news that is being circulated through the press, for one thing seems certain, and that is, that Mexico needs not armed intervention, but enlightenment and commercial development, and opportunity to share in the development of the natural resources of the rich country, which is invited by the officials of the country and peons as well.

That the oil men may know that there is need for speedy settlement of this important matter, it should be stated that the Humble Oil company, who everybody knows, is a wide awake American organization, has recently paid $60,000 for a 10-year paid up lease on land just across the Rio Grande river from Del Rio, Texas.

Mr. Pender's letter follows:

One Opinion of Mexico.

Dear Mr. Peck: I have just returned from a three months trip along the border of Mexico and also took a short trip into the republic by way of automobile. I left Mexico 20 years ago after having spent three years in the mining districts in the states of Chihuahua and Durango and, of course, feel that I know something about the Mexican people.

Twenty years ago the peasantry of Mexico comprised approximately 85 per cent of its population, and these people never had a thought of ever being anything but peasants; they never questioned the rights of the aristocracy and never had a thought of inherited rights for themselves. All previous governments in Mexico have instilled this idea into the people, and it will get exceedingly hard to impress them that they cannot do so. My conclusion that he gives, was that all of my friends who went there for a few months, returned with a very, very, very,
