Daily Biblical Quotation

Even the Texas oil fields seem to have caught the prohibition fever, many of the big wells there going onto a water production basis.

Carranza says the United States cannot settle the Jenkins' case. Wha'dju mean, cannot settle it?

The various weather prophets and astronomers came in for an awful panning Wednesday when the world failed to come to an end. A lot of folks were terribly peeved because the big show did not come off as advertised.

Who told the gentleman who works in the field adjoining this on the east, that they have "fleas in Flanders?" The talk the a. e. f. boys have been making left the impression that they are not fleas at all.

Why wouldn't Mr. Lansing be "silent" on the latest Mexican note? No man in the world knows less about what the answer of this government may be than the one in whose name that answer will be made.

The "league victory" in the ninth North Carolina continues to dwindle, the account putting the majority at less than 1,000—against close to 6,000 in the previous election. The democrats of the ninth North Carolina are just crazy about the league.

Lane's getting ready to quit. The "lonely man in the white house" is going to be short a crew if he isn't careful. But there's Gompers and Lewis and Fitzpatrick—and what's the matter with Foster for secretary of labor, in case Secretary Wilson finds it necessary to retire for his health.

OKLAHOMA CITY GETS THE BANK

Tulsa extends hearty congratulation to Oklahoma City on its signal victory in winning the moneyless federal reserve bank. The fight was a good one. Between the distinctly Kansas City to locate any bank at all in Oklahoma, Oklahoma City's threat of rebellion, Tulsa's unshakable financial showing, and the undercurrent of politics the federal reserve officials had a merry time of it for upwards of 60 days. But trimming, backing and filling, sidestepping and referendums combined can accomplish most anything—in either politics or finance.

So the tremendous ultimate of the federal reserve board is that the capital city shall have the name without the game. It is to be a "depot for forwarding money." But nobody, it seems, is required to forward money to that depot. Ample provision has been made to cover the event in case anyone should forward money there. It is not to come overnight. Oklahoma City must "depend for credit at Kansas City by wire."

Fear begets these federal reserve directors. They've been hearing things about Oklahoma. Who, we should like to know, has been talking about the oil dollars family? That pot-valiant fire-eater, Mike Monroney, is to be sent in to assume the chief sight indicates that the federal reserve board has heard about the old Pathfinder Hotel & Tower Co. and the Night and Day.

The World does not approve of that sort of thing. Neither do the members of Tulsa. We look in vain for some one to whom we can direct our complaint. Perhaps some patriotic soul will kindly inform us just what happened to Hackett, Texas, in New York. Bill Nelson may read the sagacity of Monroney to get the gist of the trouble and Lonergan may explain it to Mike. The point itself has been lost in the fog. The point itself has been lost in the fog. It is the greatest disgrace that Oklahoma can be visited with, safe and sane. For the federal reserve board frankly admits it is a matter of no consequence to them if Oklahoma City does not have a bank, provided the one to be built respects the wishes of those who pay the piper. It is for Oklahoma City to understand that she is responsible for her own acts. Tulsa is responsible for hers. Kansas City is responsible for hers. Neither Tulsa nor Kansas City has anything to do with what happens in Oklahoma City. Oklahoma City must depend for credit at Kansas City by wire.
