ROYALTY ON STAGE

Berlin Did Not Take Kindly to Seeing an Archduke on Cabaret Boards

BERLIN, May 17.—The former Archduke Leopold Salvator of Austria, who is now appearing nightly as a performer in a Berlin cabaret, was prevented by the Berlin police from wearing his aristocratic uniform and is compelled to wear the clothing of a private citizen.

Like many other members of once powerful royal families who were ashamed and barely tolerated by the war, he was forced to work for a living. His regular income from the Austrian treasury has ceased, and he receives only a few hundred kronen monthly.

Archduke Leopold, for a time, was taken seriously in Joseph Roth's novel "Radetzky March" and was written so that he could play the part of a prince who has fallen from high estate.

The Berlin public, accustomed to see the war lords treated rough by managers in object lessons of circus showers, still was not habituated to seeing royalty on the boards. The first night audience heard the archduke through without applause. Then in the merciful, embarrassed silence a man rose in his table and loudly clapped his hands. It was a former German grandduke, who also is working for his daily sustenance. From one table came a few hissing, as this grandduke of modern.

The former archduke appears under the name of Leopold Wolfonia, a pseudonym which he has also used in a number of articles he has written for newspapers.
