BLACKLEG.

BY DR. STEELE BAILEY.

Blackleg is classed among the Murrains, a term usually restricted to extensive outbreaks of disease in cattle Murrains are all infectious, i. e., capable of transmission from diseased to healthy creatures of the same, or perhaps of many different species, the manner and degree of infectiousness varying somewhat in some of the disorders. The best known Murrains are Anthrax; Blackleg, or black-quarter; Cattle Plague or Rinderpest; Pluro-Pneumonia or Lung-Plague, and Tuberculosis or Consumption. Blackleg is now present and diffusing itself virulently in some parts of Kentucky; it has become indigenous to some of the soils. In some of the Southern and Western States, especially, the annual losses from this fatal disease have been so great as to equal or exceed the losses of cattle from all other causes combined. No specific remedy has yet been suggested; a seizure means death.

Happily, however, we have an immunizing agent in Blackleg Vaccine, which is easily procured, comparatively cheap, and may be easily and successfully used by means of a hypodermic syringe by any one having ordinary mechanical ingenuity. The virus has been employed by several of the progressive farmers of Lincoln county with satisfactory results.

Blackleg, named by some Anthracoid Erysipelas, is an acute infectious disease caused by a specific germ, the Blackleg bacillus. It is characterized by extensive alterations in the parts affected, accompanied by a distension of the tissues due to the formation of gas. It was formerly thought to be identical with Anthrax, but investigations have proved that it is a specific disease by bacilli distinguishable from Anthrax bacilli. Blackleg, like Anthrax, affects wild as well as domesticated animals, and prevails the world over, but in some countries more than others. It may be restricted to certain localities even in a county; there may be certain pastures, in a given neighborhood, upon which the disease may appear, either in the spring, summer or in the fall months. Moist, undrained and swampy pastures are the ones usually regarded as inviting to the disease, but as to any peculiarities of soil nothing is definitely known. Cattle contract the disease on pastures, as do sheep and goats.

The disease is inoculable, transmission being surely and promptly effected by this means, and it may be conveyed to many animals either by inoculation or through the digestive organs. Some animals, as swine, cats, dogs, rabbits and rats enjoy an immunity. Man is also unaffected by the Blackleg bacillus. While it is infectious, Blackleg is not a contagious disease, that is an animal will not contract it simply by coming in contact with another. As a rule the germ is introduced into the system through some wound or abrasion of the skin or mucous membranes, such as may be received on the skin from a barbed wire fence or from stubbles or briars in the pasture, or from any hard, sharp substance, which punctures the lining of the mouth or intestinal tract.

It is said the bacilli do not multiply in the presence of oxygen. They do not develop on parts of the body exposed to free air, such as the skin and mucous membranes—the germs grow in parts underneath the skin, to which the air doesn't have access. A characteristic of the bacillus is that one of its ends is enlarged, due to the formation of a so called "spore," a portion of the germ surrounded by a shell like substance, very resistant to external influences, able to withstand heat, cold, light and even decomposition in a dead body. With a "spore-stage" to protect it, the Blackleg germ may exist indefinitely outside of the body and it is difficult, requiring, at least, five years of cultivation, to eradicate the disease from a pasture which has once become infected.

As to those affected by Blackleg, the ages between six and 18 months are most liable, yet animals of an older and younger age may have the disease. Statistics in Europe show that 82 per cent of all cases occur from six months to two years old; above the latter age the mortality decreases rapidly and becomes insignificant at the age of four. In this country, even in Lincoln county, calves have died at the age of four or five months. Above two years the disease is exceedingly rare.

It is stated by competent observers that full-blood or high-grade stock are more subject to the disease than common scrub or low-grade range cattle, and those rapidly improving in flesh, as is the case when they are turned upon fresh grass in the spring, are the ones predisposed to attack. One observer says that "poor cattle that pick up rapidly are more susceptible than those which remain in fairly good condition all the time;" another says that "spring calves are mostly affected in the fall, when they are very fat and are changed from grass to hay, while yearling steers are affected in the spring when turned on grass." Others attribute the disease to lack of exercise when cattle are upon good grass, believing that lactic acid accumulates in the system and which has the power of increasing the virulence of the Blackleg bacillus. As lactic acid is bound principally in the muscles, and is excreted by them thro' their activity, there is every reason to believe that lack of exercise while the grass is fresh and abundant, is a predisposing factor in the appearance of Blackleg.

SYMPTOMS.

The symptoms of Blackleg are so characteristic that the disease is easily recognized. The first symptoms may be either of a general or of a local nature, though more frequently of the latter. The general symptoms are high fever, loss of appetite and suspension of rummation, (chewing the cud), followed by great depression.

The most important diagnostic feature is the development of a tumor or swelling under the skin. The swelling may appear upon any part of the body and limbs, except below the knee or hock joint or on the tail. It is frequently seen upon the thigh and shoulder, neck, chest, flank and rump. At first the tumor is small and painful, but it grows, multiplies and in a few hours may cover the whole of the body. If pressure is made a crackling sound is heard and percussion gives a resonant sound due to the collection of gas in the affected tissue. When the tumor is lanced a frothy dark-red fluid is discharged. The swellings appear before the general symptoms, and they may reach such an extent as to cause complete paralysis of the affected parts while the animal still looks bright and has a good appetite. As the swellings increase in size the general symptoms become more intense; the temperate gets very high, resperation may exceed 140 per minute; there is trembling of the muscles which may develop into convulsions before death.

TREATMENT.

This has been a bete noir to the veterinary profession. Treatment is of no avail. All attempts at treating an animal affected with Blackleg through scarifications or incisions into the affected parts should be abandoned as dangerous and unprofitable. It is far better to destroy the animal as soon as the diagnosis is made and burn the carcass immediately, without removing it from the place where it was found. If an animal die in a stable, all litter should be removed and burned and the place thoroughly disinfected. No means have been discovered yet how to eradicate the disease from a pasture. Removal of the cattle and rest to the land doesn't do it. Outbreaks have occurred in this country in pastures where no case of Blackleg has occurred for 11 years and few people can afford to keep a pasture unstocked for that length of time.

As Blackleg is a preventible disease, efforts should be made to stamp it out, just as we do smallpox in man, by vaccination. In the pathological labratory of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Washington, a Vaccine has been prepared, subsequently tested on a large number of calves in Texas and other States and found to be perfectly satisfactory. This may be secured by making application to the secretary of agriculture, Washington. Blanks must first be secured from the department upon which to make application for the amount of Vaccine required to vaccinate your herd. then this document must be sent to the Congressman of the district in which you live, who countersigns and forwards it to the department. All that is asked and expected of the applicant is that he will make observations and report results to the bureau. Explicit instructions will be sent with the Vaccine to secure uniformity of operation and to assist persons who are without experience in the vaccinations.

A reliable Vaccine may be purchased together with an outfit from Parke, Davis & Co., Detroit, Mich. A hint to the wise is sufficient. Let every bovine between the ages of six and 24 months be immunized by thorough vaccination. Your losses from Blackleg, then, will be reduced to a minunum.

McCORMACKS CHURCH.

Thieves stole 15 or 20 empty sacks from Mr. VanArsdale last week. Mr. A. W. Carpenter says the next time any one takes his corn, he woud like for them to get that which he has saved for bread instead of his seed corn, which they took this time.

Misses Britton and McClure and Messrs. McClure and Hagan, of Harrodsburg, visited at Mr. VanArsdale's Saturday and Sunday. Messrs. Powell and Willis, of Columbia, visited B. F. Powell a few days. James A. Powell has another girl at his house, born the 23d. Squire John Bailey, of Washington county, is visiting friends and relatives here and at Turnersville. Miss Stella Hill will go to Maywood on a visit Thursday. Misses Florence Carter and Margaret Hill visited at C. H. Carter's this week. Mrs. Roy Spears has returned from a visit to relatives in Casey. C. H. Carter and family visited in the Lytle section a few days.

Miss Jennie Lillard, president of the Goebel Monument Committee of Anderson county, heard a noise in her father's corn crib, and, arming herself with a pistol, she proceeded to investigate. Arriving at the crib, she discovered Mat Pleasants, a Negro, stealing corn, and presenting the pistol at his head, she forced him to go to the house where she guarded him until officers could be summoned from town.

Five lunatics were sent to the asylum from Fayette Tuesday, the largest number on record.
