"NO SNOBBERY IN THE ARMY," IS GEN. GREENE'S ORDER AT THE CAMP

Anti-Caste Order

"THIS IS AN ARMY OF DEMOCRACY," SAYS GEN. H. A. GREENE (SHOWN IN THE CIRCLE), "AND IT MUST REMAIN DEMOCRATIC. OFFICERS AND MEN OF MY COMMAND MAY MEET AS SOCIAL EQUALS OUTSIDE OF THE CANTONMENT."

BY RUSS SIMONTON.

Camp Lewis, Washington.—There is to be no snobbery in the western division of the national army.

Maj. Gen. Henry A. Greene, commandant of Camp Lewis, has today made the unwritten caste law of the old army obselete, so far as his division is concerned.

"It is an army of democracy," he said, "and it must be democratic. Officers and men of my command may meet as social equals outside the cantonment."

By social equals General Greene means that they may sit at the same table, talk to each other as equals and enjoy the company of each other.

Inside the camp discipline requires, according to General Greene, strict adherence to the laws of military courtesy.

"In camp there is no society—only work," said the general.

He means to "practice what he preaches."

The other day he visited in a Tacoma home. An enlisted man, brother of his hostess, entered the room. There was a moment's embarrassment and then the general expressed a desire to meet the young man.

"I shook hands with him and we talked together," said the general. "Why shouldn't we? By birth, breeding and education he was my social equal. Why should we behave other than like two gentlemen should in the presence of a lady?

"There is a tendency on the part of some young officers to overestimate their importance," declared the general. "In time this wears off, and I hope that my position on this matter of the relation of the commissioned and enlisted forces will make it wear off quicker. There is no place here for the snob."

The sharp distinction between the enlisted man and his officer, that existed in the army before the war, came to the United States from England, where the officers were aristocrats and the privates from lower stations in life.

It made the army of the United States the laughing stock of European monarchies.

"Look," they said. "There is a nation that boasts of its democracy and has an army more autocratic than ours."

When the plans of the new selected army were drawn and the decision made to train the officers in training camps, officers old in the service shook their heads dubiously.

"Discipline," they wailed. "What of discipline if the officers are not taught that the enlisted man is beneath him socially?"

At first, at Camp Lewis, young officers were nonplused. There were friends of theirs in the ranks. They smiled when they saluted them and sometimes they stopped when no one was near and exchanged a few words, but always the barrier of "officer and man" was between them.

Now it is gone. The change is miraculous. It is sensed everywhere in the camp and in the cities near by, where the soldiers flock on pass.

No longer do the officers hire rooms in Tacoma hotels so they may meet friends who are carrying a rifle instead of a pistol. Now they meet openly and they shake hands and otherwise behave as fighters in a common cause.

"It is the common sense way of looking at it," said the general. "I don't know what other cantonment commanders intend to do, but so far as my division is concerned, there will be no lines of social caste."

HENNESSY STORE HONORS MEN IN ARMY WITH FLAG

Service Flag Carries Star for Each of Eight Employes With Army.

Eight employes of the Hennessy store, now with Uncle Sam's army, have been honored by a service flag, which has been raised in the center of the store. The flag, which is 5 feet by 8 feet, is on the first floor beside the elevator.

"There are eight stars on it at present," says "Store-Ore," the monthly magazine published by the Hennessy company in the interests of its employes. "This signifies that there are eight of the Hennessy family already with the colors. It is a badge of honor and we should all feel proud of our representation in the fighting forces of Uncle Sam."

The flag bears a star for each of the following men: Sam Warne, George McHugh, Emmet O'Brien, Morris McDonough, John Whelan, Joseph J. Dietzel, John Johnson, Ed Geary.
