The month of roses and nuptial festivity is passing rapidly, and its numerous weddings will shortly be things of the past. But if a book of the amusing incidents which have happened at some of the weddings of the past few weeks could be issued it would live long in matrimonial annals. One of the best stories told in connection with a recent hymeneal event might be entitled, "The Balky Bridegroom, or, When a man won't, he won't." The plans for the "happy day" had included all along the simple formula with a very unostentatious tying of the knot in the presence of a very few friends, and a hurried "skoot" to the train. The prospect was not alluring, however, to the party of the first part, and with feminine insistence she elaborated on the original plans and extended the specifications until it would seem that in absolute simplicity the limit had been reached, and perhaps passed. The week of the wedding came and two rehearsals were planned, not of the full-dress kind, but of the kind calculated to perfect a man in the gentle art of committing matrimony. The principal and seconds and a few of lesser degree were assembled at the sacred edifice and awaited the arrival of the groom. No groom came. Finally the aid of the telephone was sought, and the man was urged to appear. His refusal was most pronounced; in fact, the best man says that it was not to be pronounced—before the ladies. A versatile friend was pressed into service and went through the part manfully, and all went well. A second rehearsal was set, and again the party of the second part stubbornly refused to take part. This time it was demonstrated how well a ceremony can be performed without a groom, and all went merry as a marriage bell. It has been suggested since that she has already made him sorry for his refusal to do her will on this one occasion, but she hasn't broken his manly spirit as yet.

Strange how the old Scotch marching tune got to the heads of the bunch of American Beauties congregated to eat and drink in honor of a happy announcement. If the bagpipers could have played "The Campbells are Coming" in such glee, they might have made even a cleaner sweep of the opposing forces.

At a recent social function the guests could not restrain their amazement at the display of silver and cut glass, and one woman was heard to say that the dining room looked almost like a special cleaning day, for articles the most useless and out of place were displayed in great quantity. Suggestions were made that possibly the storage room for the great numbers of dishes was short, but it was found later that two close friends had been requested to send—not some needed articles, but "all the silver and cut glass" they possessed, for the occasion. It was done, and it has been told several times since.

In an account of the opening of the queen's fete in London on June 14, prominent mention is made of Mrs. Sidney A. Cloman, formerly Mrs. Victor Clement of this city. Mrs. Cloman was one of the ladies in charge of the American booth, and the account adds that Queen Alexandria visited this booth and became greatly interested in it, exchanging greetings with the American ladies, among whom Mrs. Cloman was one of the most admired.

When the young couple emerged from the church, they made such a rush to reach the nearest carriage that no note was taken as to which one stood handy, and the consequence was they hustled themselves into the wrong perambulator, and the mistake was not noted, of course, by the intelligent Jehu and they were driven by the supposed pursuers' swift horses to the train. Meantime the carriage ordered to convey the rice and customary footgear was not in sight when the pursuers hastened from the edifice, and they were left waiting at the church, while bride and groom escaped unharmed.

The announcement of the coming marriage of Miss Frances French to Maxwell Rice Brothers, which was printed in these columns yesterday morning, came as a great surprise to the friends of the groom in this city. Mr. Brothers has made his home here for some years past, and he has made many friends. Miss French has also many friends locally, and the good wishes of Salt Lakers have followed the young man on his important journey.
