Ultimate Triumph.

It was long ago apparent to close observers that the leading measures initiated by Congress for the permanent reorganization and pacification of the late rebellious States could not be successfully carried through without a severe, and perchance protracted, struggle. It was well known that powerful interests and deep prejudices would be linked together to embarrass and thwart their operation, and thus heap difficulties in the way which it was hoped would at last neutralize, and possibly nullify, them. Hence the annoyance and trouble which has attended reorganization and embarrassed legislation from time to time as this problem has been in process of solution, and which, were it not for this, would have long ago unified the whole people and sheltered under one common aegis every man in the land.

But, notwithstanding the adverse influences which have thus blocked the path of progress, and the unforeseen causes of political disintegration which have been developed in Tennessee, Texas and Virginia, we do not despair or doubt the final triumph of Republican principles, because we have faith in human progress. We see the ebbing and flowing of the tide, the advancing and retreating lines, but above all, a general and substantial advance in the aggregate of grand results which mark the changes going on. We cannot always measure the exact distance as we go forward; but, at certain stages, we can look back and distinguish the broad difference which marks the traveled pathway over which we have come.

With respect to the most significant changes in the civil and social status of the people in the South, we do not believe there is any such thing as going back. The situation, from the unmistakable course of things, must be accepted, and under it all must do the best they can to work out the destiny of the future. There is a wide field for action, and there are a thousand influences for good which may be brought into the work of rehabilitation. It only remains for the Southern people to appreciate their opportunities and adapt themselves to this condition of things with the best grace possible, and with discretion and forecast work out their own salvation. They should remember that mere forms have lost their power to sway the American people, and though political measures and policies may fluctuate, for the time being, there can be no mistake as to the ultimate result; for it is plain to see there is an element in popular strength and in the deep-seated convictions of the great mass of the American people which shats down on the dead past and speaks and works for the living present.

We have only to stand firm on the foundations of equal justice, improving with all the aids which experience and observation teaches, and all will come out right. The sublime destiny of equal rights, with regulated liberty, will still be ours, as well as the crowning glory of the age in which we live.

A Tribute to Mr. Corcoran.

The Board of Aldermen and the Board of Common Council of the city of Washington have each passed, almost unanimously, the following eloquent preamble and enactment, proposed by Alderman Connolly, of the Third ward:

Whereas it is just and proper for the corporate authorities of the city of Washington to manifest the respect and gratitude of the people toward a venerable and distinguished citizen, whose honorable life has been passed among them, whose munificent generosity and charities have recognized no distinctions, either of sect, party, or nationality, and in whose joys and griefs the people of this District have for many years most earnestly sympathized; therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Mayor and presidents of the Boards be, and are hereby, authorized and requested to procure a full length portrait of W. W. Corcoran, esq., to be placed in an appropriate apartment in the City Hall, and that the same be paid for out of the general fund, for which a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated.

The Mayor will doubtless approve this grateful and graceful tribute, and the people of this community, though not formally, will heartily sanction the act and commend the manner of its performance.

In offering the bill in the Board of Aldermen, Mr. Connolly said it was but an act of justice. Mr. Corcoran had long proved a noble benefactor to the people of this District, and a people without resentments and gratitude would be unworthy of him. "I have never stood in his presence, nor spoken with him," said Mr. C., "nor is it likely that, in our respective walks in life, we shall ever meet. It hence is not the partial impulse or sentiment of an individual citizen that is embodied in this enactment. In it are expressed the convictions and the gratitude of a whole people, who, having no other means of presenting the tribute of their respect and affection, will heartily applaud the simple, yet eloquent, manifestation of placing the portrait of this honored citizen among those of the venerated men who have long been recognized as the sages and fathers of our cities and District, and the memory of whom will be cherished throughout the long and joyous pathway of the future."

AT THE RECENT SESSION of the convention of the Seventh Congressional district of Massachusetts, Senator Wilson, who was present, made a speech, in which he claimed that Grant was conducting his administration on a higher plan than any since John Quincy Adams. The Associated Press did not find this out, however. It could only appreciate the fact that Mr. Brooks was nominated.

ADVERTISE YOUR WARES, WANTS, &c., in the REPUBLICAN, for it goes into every house in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and is read by everybody.
