A SECOND LOLA MONTEZ.

A Fair Cincinnatian in Europe--Royalty Captivated by the Blandishments of Mrs. Fanny Jordan, nee Miss Chumley, of Cincinnati.

[From the Cincinnati Times and Chronicle.]

All Munich is at the present time full of rumors about a strange love affair between the young King of Bavaria and an American confidence woman. The following particulars of this interesting affair, which has caused a great deal of merriment among the Bavarian democrats, but which has deeply disgusted the members of the royal family, to whom the eccentric young King has frequently given much offense, have been ascertained from trustworthy sources:

In the last days of January, 1872, there arrived in Munich an American lady of about twenty-eight or thirty, of very prepossessing appearance, elegant manners, and richly dressed. She registered her name at the Oberpollinger hotel, where she stopped, as MRS. FANNY JORDAN, FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO, U. S.

Mrs. Jordan was accompanied by a femme de chambre, had plenty of baggage with her, and, to all appearances, was in easy circumstances. She had letters of introduction to the consul of the United States, and had little difficulty in gaining access to the best circles of society. Even her wish to be presented at court was gratified, and she was introduced to the Queen Dowager at a soiree given at the palace.

It appears that Mrs. Jordan conceived, some time after her presentation at court, the idea of entrapping the young King, who rarely appeared in his capital, but most of the time led almost the life of a hermit at his delightful country seat of Hohenschwangan. In the course of her conversations with newly-gained aristocratic acquaintances, she heard a great deal about the eccentricities of the young monarch; of his love of music and of the stage; of his warm, open heart; his unbounded liberality toward those to whom he had become attached; and, lastly, of his seemingly invincible repugnance to enter the holy state of matrimony.

Mrs. Jordan resolved to see the King, and on the 12th of February set out for the village of Bergen, near Hohenschwangan, and engaged two rooms at the Golden Bear hotel. She was not long in ascertaining the places where the King, who is fond of walking out alone for hours in the neighborhood of his country seat, might be met, and on the first fine day Mrs. Jordan walked out with her femme de chambre in order to meet King Louis, and, if possible, to make his acquaintance. On that day she was unsuccessful, and after walking about for nearly four hours she had to return to the hotel without encountering the King. But two days afterwards she had better luck. About 3 o'clock in the afternoon she saw dressed in a suit of iron gray, his head covered with a broad-brimmed, low-crowned hat, and jauntily carrying a riding-whip in his hand, approaching by a by-path leading to the highway. Mrs. Jordan, who recognized the well-known features of the King at once, hastened to make preparations for attracting his attention. She took from the hands of her maid a telescope and a traveler's hand-book, and seemed lost in admiration of the truly beautiful scenery of the environs of Hohenschwangau. A few minutes afterward the King was close to her. The prepossessing appearance of the American lady, her evident admiration of the landscape, of which Louis the Second is very proud, made at once an impression upon him, and he stood still, lifting his hat. With

CONSUMMATE SKILL AND TACT,

Mrs. Jordan retarged his salutation, and, approaching the King, asked him about the name of a village which was to be seen in the distance. The King, who is one of the most affable of men, politely gave the information she desired, and then entered into conversation with her. They conversed in French, walking slowly along the highway toward the village, and, on separating, Mrs. Jordan, who expressed a great desire to visit Hohenschwangau, was overjoyed to receive from the King, who told her with unaffected frankness who he was, and who requested her not to call him "Majesty," an invitation to inspect his country seat and pass an hour or two in his delightful gardens, which are among the finest in Europe.

It may be imagined that she improved the opportunity thus presented to her, and on the following afternoon called on the King. He kindly escorted her through the palace, showed her the fine picture gallery, the theatre, the conservatory, with its superb tropical plants, and the fountains in the gardens. Her well-calculated efforts to make an impression upon him, her skill as a conversationalist, her refined manners, her lively temperament and yet lady-like reserve did not remain without effect upon the King, who, even though he sits on a throne, is little versed in worldly affairs, and by no means insensible to the

BLANDISHMENTS OF A PRETTY AND ACCOMPLISHED WOMAN.

When Mrs. Jordan finally bade him adieu, he shook her warmly by the hand, and asked her to visit him again, and even promised to return her call.

He was as good as his word, and next day he paid her a visit at the Golden Bear. The King had often been there, and so his interview with Mrs. Jordan, which took place in the parlor of the landlady, excited but little attention. Mrs. Jordan's road to success was now an easy one. She met the King frequently at Hohenschwangan, or in the environs. The two made long excursions on horseback, or walked for hours in the wooded hills of the neighborhood. The siren seemed to exercise an irresistible charm upon the Prince. His attendants noticed that he became thoughtful and melancholy; but, knowing that remonstrances would be of no avail, did nothing to interfere with his intimacy with the American lady. Mrs. Jordan soon received

SUBSTANTIAL MARKS OF THE ROYAL FAVOR.

Being a very good horsewoman, she was presented with a very fine white mare by the King. Other valuable gifts followed in quick succession. A valuable diamond bracelet, a miniature portrait of the King, framed in solid gold and set with emeralds, and other presents of value, were pressed upon her by her royal friend, or rather lover. Finally, she managed to obtain loans of quite large sums of money from him. Everything went swimingly, and Mrs. Jordan was in a fair way of becoming to Louis the Second what Lola Montes had been to his grandfather, King Louis the First, when an untoward event put an end to the whole intimacy, and compelled the American adventuress to leave her field of operations precipitately. Prince Luitpold, the King's uncle, heard of his royal nephew's liaison, and determined at once to break it up. For this purpose he engaged the services of two Munich detectives, who, in the first place, tried to discover

WHO SHE REALLY WAS.

On application at the office of the United States consul, they were shown the letters of introduction which she had presented to that functionary, and which were from reputable people in Cincinnati and New York. At the Oberpollinger hotel, where she had stopped for nearly a month, nothing could be said against her. She had always conducted herself with the strictest propriety, and had promptly paid her bills. But she had left three large trunks at the hotel, and the detectives, with that disregard of personal rights so peculiar to the police of Germany, broke the trunks open. They found in them numerous letters, which left no doubt of the real character of Mrs. Jordan. It appeared from these letters that she had passed the last three years in several European capitals under various aliases. It was true that she was from Cincinnati, but her real name, as appeared from several letters written to her father, was Chumley. She had at least not a few of which had contained valuable inclosures. She had last been at Berlin, where she had had a liaison with a Prussian colonel, who had committed forgery to gratify her incessant demands for money, and who, in consequence, had been cashiered. She herself had escaped arrest only by precipitate flight from Berlin. In short, the detectives discovered that she was a dangerous confidence women of the worst sort, and they went thereupon to the village where she was stopping, and told her that they would arrest her unless she consented to leave Bavaria at once.

The baffled adventuress at first tried to put on a bold front, and showed a disposition to bid defiance to the officers; but when told that her true character was thoroughly known she deemed discretion the better part of valor, and, after writing a tearful letter to the King, set out for Switzerland. It is believed that she took, in money and valuables, about ten thousand dollars with her.
