TERRIBLE TRAGEDY IN DELAWARE.

A Servant Killed by a Physician and Shipped by Chemicals.

[From the Dover Delawarian, Dec. 7.]

This community was startled on Thursday morning by the announcement that the body of a man, partially burned, headless and footless, had been found in the office of Dr. Isaac C. West. An examination of the premises, a view of the remains, and attendance on the coroner's inquest, coupled with the absence of Dr. West and of a negro named Cooch Turner, have led us to the belief that a murder of the most atrocious description has been committed, together with an attempt to burn a row of houses to conceal the crime. The facts, as far as we have been able to gather them, are as follows:

A young man known as Dr. Isaac C. West, who professed to treat patients suffering from pulmonary complaints by the inhalation process, has been occupying a room in the second story of a new building recently erected by James M. Kerbin, on Loockerman street, between Governor's avenue and New street, in which he had apparatus for manufacturing a gas called "electro-oxygen." On Wednesday night, about 11:30 o'clock, West left the Capital hotel, where he boarded, stating to the clerk, Mr. Culbreth, that he was going to his office for the purpose of attending to some gas which he said he was preparing, conveying the idea that he had left the lamp burning under the retort.

At about 12:30 o'clock Mr. O. W. Benn, who lives in the dwelling part of the paint shop adjoining West's office, was called to by his wife, who told him she believed something serious had happened next door, as she heard a noise as if something heavy had fallen, followed by a noise like that made by a sewing machine. Mr. Benn got out on the window coping and looked into West's window, and found the place to be on fire. He gave the alarm, and with some neighbors broke into the room, and took the fire under control; but a sight that thrilled all present with horror was presented when a light was brought into the room. On the floor by the benches and footless body of a man, partially roasted by the fire.

The first impression was that this was the body of Dr. West, and that he had been killed by an explosion of the gas which he had been manufacturing, or of some chemicals he had been using. This impression, however, was not sustained by the condition of the body or its surroundings. The body, when found, was lying on its back, with a parcel of burnt pine wood, apparently pieces of boxes, another and about it.

The head was entirely gone, and not a trace of it was to be found in the room, the neck looking as though the head had been severed from it with an axe. Both feet were gone—taken off above the ankle joints—and no trace of them in the room. There was not a particle of clothing about the body. Not a single article, such as a knife, a watch, or a bunch of keys, usually carried by gentlemen, was to be found on the body or anywhere in the room. The brim of a silk hat and pieces of a coat and waistcoat belonging to West were found in a part of the room away from the body. Some pieces of a plaid shirt, like one worn by Cooch Turner before his disappearance, also a piece of striped pantaloon stuff, were found in the room. It is conjectured that the mutilated body had been placed on one end of the large goods box, from which it fell after the fire had burnt that side of the box away. This seems probable from the fact that the back, which was next the floor when the body was found, with a few pieces of burnt wood about it, was burnt more than the front, and also from the fact that the floor immediately under the body was not burnt.

A post-mortem examination of the body was subsequently made by Drs. Robert Jump and Edwin O. Shakespear, with what result we have not learned at this writing. There are a great many theories in circulation in regard to the manner in which the body came to its death, but we prefer not advancing any of them until the investigation before the coroner's jury has been concluded. The circumstance that a man answering somewhat the description of West got on the cars at Dover at 4 o'clock in the morning is, in a manner, connected with the affair.

[LATER.]

Just as we were going to press last evening Dr. West came up on the 5 p. m. train, and delivered himself to the sheriff, having previously telegraphed that he was coming. He says that he killed Cooch Turner in self-defence; that he got Cooch to carry up a bucket of water; that he went up stairs behind Cooch; that as he was going in the door Cooch raised a hammer, saying, "Your money or your life;" that he (West) seized a bar of iron and struck Cooch on the neck, killing him instantly; that having the dead body on hand he did not know what to do with it; that he cut it up and carried it away piece at a time; that he put the head under a brush heap near Squire Smith's, and the feet in a lime pile on the Hazlewile road; says that he did not intend to burn the buildings.

It is needless to say that his explanations of the killing are not credited. A large crowd awaited his arrival at the depot, where he was taken in charge by the officers. He is now lodged in jail. His brothers and his father-in-law joined him in the cell. They were very much distressed and in tears; while West, coolly and apparently unconcerned, ate his supper.

West is respectably connected. His parents live in Baltimore hundred, Sussex county. His father-in-law is the recorder of deeds for this county. West was first known in this town as a blacksmith's apprentice, but having higher aspirations, he applied himself to study, and, we understand, finally graduated at college.

DINED INTO DYSPEPSIA.

Mark Twain's Sad Experience in England—Too Many Dinners.

[London Corr. Correspondence Cincinnati Commercial.]

In Turkey the malefactor is visited with the bastinado; in Russia he is doomed to the slow administration of the knout. In either country the criminal is more fortunate than the unlucky foreigner who has unwittingly allowed himself to succumbed hospitality among the English. The punishment of London lunches is as much more merciful than the (Stanbou) bastinado as it appears at first more seductive. The symptoms of the patient in either case hardly fall short of the horrible. In the one case the face turns black immediately; in the other the liver grows black finally. Poor Mark Twain, under the latter ordeal, is seen by his friends in London to be growing rapidly thinner and paler.

Day after day he drags himself still an hour later in the afternoon from his bed at the Langham, where efforts at sleep have ceased to restore his relaxing energies. But for Americans to understand the full severity of the sentence to which their countryman has been condemned in England, it is only necessary to comprehend a single one of its two hundred constituent elements—an English dinner. The true London dinner consists of from twelve to twenty courses, the half of which are substantial meats, fish, fowls, and game, braced up and interpolated with pastries, soups, and entrees. Then follows a vista of sullen puddings and sodden sweets, cakes, custards, and mixed ices, whose consumption points toward death and the hours of midnight. And still the ponderous feast is not over. There remains piles of green nuts and over-nourished fruits, insidious entrees of late dessert with foreign flavour, and lastly, that inevitable, fatal comestible, crowning the goal of every British dinner, and whose very look and odor are suggestions of the grave—a Stilton cheese! But the London dinner is not mostly a thing of eating.

As far as it has been said, it is an affair to be drank, rather than masticated, its succeeding courses appearing to be introduced mainly for the object of clearing the palate for a fresh flavor of wine. A microscopic but finely-flavored English plat of micro[illegible] at the meal, Sauterne or Moselle opens that beg[illegible] work, with the fish that follows succeed to the [illegible] and Sauternes give way to the oysters. Moselle and Hungarian in the substantial sherry [illegible] is carried forward with third course. The sherry, is carried forward with a red Burgundy to accompany the [illegible] of game, or the heavy roast of English sirloin that breaks the first shock of appetite in the progress of dining. Chateau Yquem or white Tokay attends the fowl that replaces the roast. Game is introduced, with claret and champagne. A succeeding dish is supported by a glass of Madeira. The Madeira, in turn, is contrasted with a Greek wine, and a bottle of Manzanilla is deftly inserted to brace the flagging stimulant of the Tenedos. With the dessert appear the massive Southern wines—port and Spanish—while the heavy English favorite, sherry, has not once disappeared from the cloth. The black wines are carried through the dessert and fruits. Bordeaux is sipped with the cheese, after which the guests drink all round liqueurs Chatreuse or Maraschino, for better digestion, and the ladies retiring, after the English fashion, the cloth is withdrawn, Cognac and whisky introduced, and the regular drinking of an English dinner party begins.

To support this enormous and massive eating and drinking, one would suppose that the Englishman would find it convenient if not absolutely necessary to recline, like the Romans, at their meals. The inference is as absurd as the fancy of an Anglo-Saxon in a classic position. An Englishman is never steadier than when he rises from five hours of dining. He appears to carry off his tons of food and gallons of wine as lightly as if they were a biscuit and a cup of tea. And as for the marvelous population that follows the ordinary English dinner, the aristocratic Londoner appears simply as a porous membrane through which liquids disappear with the simplicity of the endosmose process in nature—or rather, cognac and whisky sink into his organization as gracefully as if the British stomach were the proper receptacle and destiny of the above beds.

The upper class English are undoubtedly the best-dined and best-wined race in the world; and there appears to be a dispensation in the moist, unsteady atmosphere of the English climate that atones for its disagreeableness by allowing an impunity of appetite to the inhabitants which exists nowhere else. The climate is a soaking one literally. An American arriving in England finds that he can add one third to his ration of the spirituous beverages without apprehension. But the stomach of Crassus would not suffice Mark Twain to enjoy even a moiety of the substantial good will which he is finding among his doughty English friends. British hospitality has always had something deadly about it. Whether in barrack room, country house or city club, it pours out its administrations to the death with a unceasing intent to kill. Train is already complaining that his London dinners have long since ceased to digest, but continue to stretch, while his friendly entertainers, apprehending that he may recover from their first shock—"he must die of dinners," they say—and live to reach his friends, are preparing for him the coup de grace of a [illegible] hunt.

THE "DOUG STEVENS" MONUMENT.—The finishing touches are put to the monument erected to the memory of the Hon. Thaddeus Stevens this morning in Shre[illegible]ter's graveyard. The monument is a beautiful one, and reflects credit to its maker, Pearson E. Gray, of Lancaster.

Upon the north side of the monument is the following inscription, cut out in neat and tasty letters, viz:

—Thaddeus Stevens,
Born at Danville, Caledonia county, Vermont,
April 4, 1792.
Died at Washington, D. C.,
August 11, 1868.

Upon the south side we find:

I repose in this quiet and secluded spot,
Not for any natural preference for solitude;
But finding other cemeteries limited to a race
By an arbitrary rule,
I have chosen this that I might illustrate,
In my death,
The principles I advocated
Through a long life:
Equality of man before his Creator.

The monument is made of Concwingo granite, the base weighting about eight tons. The pilasters of granite, and weighs about four tons. The panels are of Italian marble. The caps are of granite, and weigh five tons. Under the caps and above the panels is found a neat delicate course of drapery, made of black stone. The entire structure is 7 feet 8 inches high, 5 feet 4 inches long, and 4 feet 8 inches wide, and is well worth a visit from our citizens as well as from visitors from abroad.—Lancaster Examiner, Dec. 6.

20 bbls. of PLANT'S EXTRA FLOUR.
This Flour is made from selected western Wheat, and is the choicest brand made in the United States. We guarantee it in every sale. We have made arrangements with the manufacturer to keep this Flour constantly on hand. We have had so much trouble and consumers have found so much dissatisfaction with the cheapest Flour made in this market that, at no little expense and trouble, we are able to offer this brand for sale to consumers in this city. We respectfully invite a trial, and if in every purchase; and if not satisfactory, can be returned and money refunded.
