GEN. GRANT'S SECOND INAUGURATION.

The second inauguration of Gen. Grant, which takes place to-day, marks the beginning of a new epoch in our political history. It marks, first of all, the full and complete triumph of the principles that were enunciated in fear and trembling more than sixteen years ago; i. marks a Union restored, a people emancipated; it is the living, outward sign that republican government in the United States is a pure and unadulterated democracy under which all men stand upon the same level of civil and religious liberty. The life of the President who will be inaugurated today is the record of the most glorious achievements of the Republic during the last twelve years. He is the representative of its victories in the field, of its triumphs in peace, of its marvelous prosperity and advancement during the last decade.

To-day is one of the three memorable peace-days in General Grant's life. Eight years ago he marched through Washington at the head of the victorious armies that had conquered the rebellion. Four years ago he was inaugurated President amidst the plaudits of the entire nation, and to-day he will be again installed as Chief Magistrate for the next four years with an enthusiasm and a unanimity that has scarcely a parallel since the days of Washington, when a young republic, coming out of the long travail of a bloody and protracted revolution, with one accord selected its great military chieftain to lead it through the scarcely less difficult and dangerous paths of peace. General Grant may well feel proud of the ceremonies with which to-day the people strive to do him honor; but no more modest and humble man will this morning pass beneath the triumphal arches that span the Avenue. In whatever light he may be regarded, he stands a magnificent type of the American citizen—simple, unpretending, capable of doing great things in a way that makes the world sometimes forget he is great, and think that each and every one of us could do what he has done.

But putting aside all these mere personal considerations, and turning to the great national questions which his second inauguration naturally suggest, we are certain that the most bitter and the most prejudiced can see in it only omens of good cheer for the future. It is, of course, impossible to disguise the fact that his re-election marks the ascendancy of one political party and the defeat of another; but the victory which he achieved was so great and overwhelming as almost to obliterate party lines, and make it, as far as it was possible to make it, a national triumph. General Grant will to-day, in fact as well as in name, the President of the whole people more than any one of his predecessors since Washington. It is true that a venomous brood of vipers endeavored to sting him to death darling the late canvass; that he was slandered and defamed in the most brutal manner by men who had made his conquests and victories the stepping stones to power and place and emolument; but when the hour came to render the popular verdict the people rallied to his support and gave renewed evidence of their faith in his ability, patriotism and devotion to the best interests of the country. General Grant owes his victory to no man and no set of men. The opposition have told us that it was the forty thousand postmasters, the assessors, the collectors, and the gaugers who, organized and disciplined, defeated Mr. Greeley and the Liberal Republican party. It was a pleasant way of accounting for it. But in all that whole movement, whose crowning we shall celebrate to-day, there was a power higher and greater than office-holders and office-seekers which controlled and impelled them. That power stands behind Gen. Grant to-day and will go up with him in spirit, at least, to the eastern front of the Capitol. Once for all, parties and politicians had better understand that he is the master of them all, master because the people are master, and have made him the minister and executor of their will. It is true that he owes some allegiance to the men who stood with him in the front line of the battle, but there is after all something higher and greater and better than party in this country, and we are confident that Gen. Grant will not sacrifice or ignore it merely to catch the breath of a fleeting public opinion. His first term closes in a blaze of glory—not the glory of battle or of conquest, but of peace. During the last four years the country has been singularly prosperous. The wounds of the war have been healed; the national indebtedness, which pressed down the industries and the enterprise when he was first called to the Executive chair, has been sensibly reduced, and its entire payment demonstrated to be only a question of a few years; taxation has been lessened; troublesome foreign questions have been satisfactorily and honorably settled; peace has been maintained at home and abroad; the law enforced equally and impartially, and the American republic elevated to a higher point in the estimation of the world than ever before. The verdict of history upon the Administration that has all but closed will be, we are certain, that it was eminently wise, dignified, practical and patriotic.

THE WEST POINTERS.

For more than the reason that they will infinitely add to the grandeur of the display of to-day, we are glad that the cadets of the United States Military Academy are with us. They are a fine body of young fellows, gentlemen by breeding and by profession, and the superior exhibition they made yesterday afternoon in front of the Arlington proves that they are making rapid progress towards soldierly perfection. Members of Congress will now have afforded them an excellent opportunity of witnessing their proficiency, and it is to be hoped the gentlemen of the lower House especially will take advantage of it.

There is a rather insane idea abroad to the effect that these young men belong exclusively to aristocratic circles; that, as a body, they fail to properly represent the democratic spirit of the country. This is as unjust as it is erroneous, and it will be to the advantage of our coming army, officered by these cadets, when the idea is completely eradicated. In every generous sense of the word "representative" the members of this disciplined corps "fill the bill." Every Congressional district in the country has its representative at West Point, appointed upon the recommendation of its Congressman, irrespective, very frequently, of politics.

This fact, taken into consideration in connection with the peculiar fabric of our political system, will convince the most prejudiced that the cadets come directly from the masses. To prove the truth of our assertion we have but to instance the case of the hero who co-day is again so highly honored by the people; to mention the gallant Sheridan, a poor farmer's son; to name the departed Orsky Mitchell, the celebrated astronomer, who, but poorly clad, footed it to "the Point," when he began his career—and, if necessary, a hundred similar cases could be named.

We say these few words in praise of the lads because there seems to be a growing feeling antagonistic to their success. Our word for it, they will make a worthy impression during their stay; and we hope that their makers, (in a professional sense,) the legislators at the Capitol, will be the first to recognize the brave and courteous gentleman under the snug-fitting uniform of the cadet, be he "plebe" or first-classman.

PARTY DISCIPLINE.

To-day (not yesterday, as the sapient constitutional blunderer of the New York Times would have us believe,) sees the final dissolution of the Forty-second Congress, during whose deliberations a great deal has been accomplished towards the simultaneous dissolution of the great party which should have, at least, made some organized effort to direct its political influence upon the country, as well as its routine work and its conduct in affairs of statesmanship. We declare, and we are neither afraid nor ashamed of the declaration, that there is in this country an absolute necessity for partisan politics and politicians. There is danger in all excesses, but with a mobile, excitable, nervous people, like the Americans, there is no possibility of our remaining fixed at any one point or pursuing at all times one invariable line of policy. Sometimes excessive partisanship will lead a people astray, as it did when the Democratic party sprung under our feet the mine of rebellion, for which catastrophe no one was prepared; but the deadly tendency of such a perversion of political ideas was inevitably opposed by a prompt response from the higher and nobler instincts of the nation, to which, under God, we owe our national integrity and our hopeful future. But let us consider for a moment what would have been the result of our civil war had the cause of liberty and nationality been supported by guerillas and fancy knights errant instead of a compact and disciplined army; if the legislation and the moral guidance of the country had been intrusted to the hands of moonstruck philosophers, who spent their time in proving it to be the constitutional duty of the Union army to surrender to its demoralized and half-beaten enemy; of the original nation to sue for peace at the feet of defiant rebels; or, in other words, of every man to cut his own throat?

Was party discipline of no value then? Did not the earnest and enduring front presented by the majority of Congress during the dark days of 1862 and 1863 against the outspoken enemies of the Union and their pettifogging, sneaking crowd of claquers who fritted the air with dismal discords from their asthmatic toot-horns and cracked kettle drums, to distract attention from the real issue, strengthen the arms and warm the hearts of the patriotic heroes in the field and their earnest brethren at home? What has come over the spirit of our dream, that the same Fernando Wood who, while mayor of New York, recommended the secession of that city and its erection into the similitude of ancient Venice, who was peculiarly interested in the sale of arms to the Southern rebels, who openly advocated secession, and so voted in a minority of one from his seat in the House of Representatives, and who was, by order of the House, publicly reprimanded by the Speaker for having uttered disloyal sentiments in debate, can now rise and offer to impeach that same Speaker for an act which is trivial compared with the lightest of Andrew Johnson's crimes, and form with him every Democratic vote and one-sixth of the Republican votes in the House? How does it come that the Republican party has suffered itself to be hoodwinked and bullied and slapped in the face by a set of men whose political record it has a hundred times condemned, and whose political action it has often stigmatized as the next step to flagrant treason? Is our war record, both upon the field and in the halls of legislation, nothing to be proud of, to be protected, and therefore duly honored? Shall captured rebel battle flags be torn from the walls of the State house of the grand old Commonwealth of Massachusetts while Federal officers carry their lives in their hands in many a Southern State? Shall every malicious whisper of scandal find ten eager listeners to one indignant protestant, while, in the elegant euphemism of the chivalry, "no Yankee can be a gentleman?" Or do we feel so serene and self-complacent at hard-won supremacy that we do not care to heed these flies buzzing around our ears, these rain drops pattering on our window panes?

It may be so, but the ridiculous flurry caused in Congress by the investigations, which were managed and controlled, more than we are yet aware of, by the Democratic side, and the more painful exhibition of the indecent anxiety of many Republicans to make as many scape-goats as possible, perhaps in order to profess excessive political honesty, and, perhaps, for a more disreputable reason, do not seem to us in accord with the dignified poise and firmness of a body of men animated by one purpose and striving for one object—to protect the nation from its enemies. We seek in vain for the solid phalanx of 1861 to 1869. We have no leader. The sentiments expressed above will find a response in the breast of every Republican, but they lack coherence and force and symmetrical expression. This is not as it should be. The memories of past dangers, the companionships of past struggles, the bonds of unity among comrades who learned among trials and tribulations to respect every man who bore the banner of the Union for his heroism in danger, his skill and resources in attack and his patient endurance in disaster, should have a different result from this. Republicans should remember that it is they who have made the history of the republic what it is, and the recollection of what they have accomplished should animate them to fresh labors in the cause of liberty and enhance their respect for and confidence in each other. Unless there is this common bond of cohesion and self-assertion as a party the politics of the country will be thrown into anarchy, and out of the chaos of aimless action and stupid inaction, bad, bold men will rise to the surface and take the lead. The Republican party is not perfect, but it should not be in haste to proclaim its imperfections and its follies at the bidding of its old enemy, the Democratic party, which is far beneath it in dignity and virtue, and has learned during the last decade absolutely but one lesson, which is that husks are not filling diet, and it is sweet to hold office. For them to fight guerilla fashion is natural enough, as they are in a minority and can only fatigue and harass us by hanging on our flanks and carrying on a nomadic and straggling warfare. It is our plan, on the contrary, to keep unbroken ranks and cheer each other by encouragement and praise. We must believe and trust in each other, and work together as one man. We have the elements of power and unity, while our opponents are a discordant, straggling rabble. Let us beware lest we fall into the same desperate condition, and thus wantonly expose ourselves to their cunning and covert attacks. Let the coming four years show a fitting addition to the record of the past three Administrations.
