Cowpeas and Soy Beans.

A good plant can be grown wherever a weed will grow. Weed growing does not pay. To grow fewer weeds should be a problem with each farmer. To a very great degree, many farmers are solving the question and the various ways of growing cowpeas and soy beans, and the uses made, make up the chief factor in the solution of the weed question in all our cultivated land.

Their quick growing habits, make it possible to grow them under a great many circumstances and a few of the ways of growing is the object of this bulletin.

They may be grown for hay and for seed. The most common method with the cowpeas is to drill with a grain drill, using each drill hoe, dropping peas from 3 to 4 inches apart in the rows. Soy beans are best drilled in rows from 28 to 32 inches apart and from three to four inches in drill row, and cultivated two or three times lightly. Drilling is sometimes done with grain drill by stopping up some of the holes.

Both cowpeas and soy beans usually seed better in a medium than a rich soil, but make more hay in rich soil. They also commonly seed better in the same soil after the first year. Seeding for seed or hay should commonly not be done much before the first of June.

CATCH CROPS.

Catch crops of cowpeas may be grown after an oat or wheat crop has been cut, sown as late as July 10th they often make a good hay crop or a pasture or may be turned under for green manure. Where a stand of corn is not too thick they may also be sown between the rows when corn is "laid by." This is best done with a one-horse grain drill made for drilling grain between corn rows.

The outside drill holes may be stopped and three rows only drilled as this is commonly enough to cover the ground well to prevent weed growth. Where the stand of corn is heavy it is not likely that the peas could do much For these catch crops New Era cowpeas are best.

For planting in the hills with the corn many prefer the soy bean as it can be planted safely a little earlier than is safe to plant cowpeas. Soy beans do not vine hence do not interfere so much with the cultivator. They are best planted with an attachment to the planter, but some mix corn and beans in planter boxes being sure to stir them up well at each end of rows or all beans and no corn would be coming from the plates.

The variety of soy bean to put in corn to be cut for fodder or silo would perhaps be the medium yellow, or the Mammoth, and where it is desired to run the pigs or sheep in the field the Mongol or Sable would be better. Try a small field of medium land, putting two grains of corn and three Mongel soy beans to each hill. When you "lay by" the corn drill three rows of New Era cowpeas between the rows. About corn cutting time turn lambs or shoats or both into the field, first feeding soy beans and cowpeas over the fence for a day or two till the stock learn to eat them. Fatten hogs and sheep or hogs only on the corn, or "hog down" the patch then try the same field to corn or any other crop the next season and note results. You can by this process raise very few weeds, grow more feed and your stock can harvest the crop for you, and scatter their own manure.

The peas sown as indicated take about one-third bushel per acre, and of the soy beans about one gallon per acre. Such processes will build your soil much faster than we can do it with the clovers. A trial will convince. Why not also consider growing a few for seed? When we grow our own seed we will not so much notice the high price.
